The play has two modes, or settings. The Rice family home dominates. This is where the dynamics of the family relationships are played out. This is counterpointed by scenes of Archie in his saloon life as a superannuated comic whose "cuteness" has long since crusted over. The songs and dances are appropriately crass and seedy, and the jokes are indeed unfunny. It's an opportunity for a very clear look at Archie, but little [illegible]erges that [illegible] family [illegible] through the family [illegible]. It must be said [illegible] Mahnken is f[illegible] in some of [illegible] when he f[illegible] [illegible], but the [illegible] upon [illegible] scenes are n[illegible] as the unfolding [illegible] the family; at times [illegible] seem intrusive and unnecessary.

These difficulties of "scene-changing" are compounded by the sheer physical awkwardness of the transition: the Rice livingroom is dragged jolting and creaking upstage by some undoubtedly wondrous but ungentle machine. This is jarring to the audience in a way that actors can do little to recover.

If problems exist, and the play isn't a paragon of formal virtuosity, it remains a fascinating assemblage of character studies, and a strong, hard vision of reality. For instance, Phoebe Rice must be one of the finest, most naked and oddly tender portraits of a totally oppressed woman ever seen on stage (though at this point I'm not sure whether that's not more Joyce o'Connor's doing than John Osborne's).

The end of the play seems to [illegible] a[illegible] of Archie, [illegible] it's sort of cl[illegible] stuff, and in [illegible] stance, director [illegible] didn't provide [illegible] production that th[illegible] lacked.

But I hear me prot[illegible] much. It remains an [illegible] interesting play, and [illegible] production, one with [illegible] truly exceptional performances. The Entertainer is running every third week this semester, alternating with The Importance of Being Earnest and Rosmersholm. It's playing again in Bartlett Auditorium Wednesday through Sunday this week, and again beginning April 10. Tickets may be obtained at the Bartlett box office or reserved by calling 545-2579. Don't forget, Tuesday, March 19 is "Dollar Night" for "The Importance of Being Earnest," all seats $1.

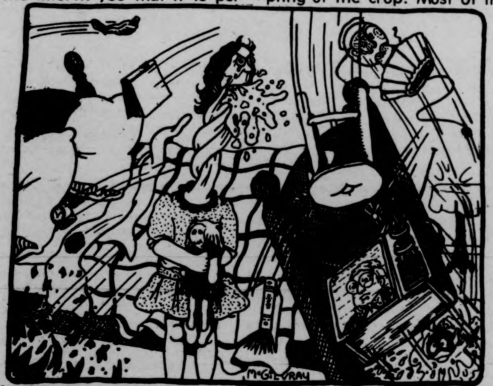
You May Not Puke But You Won't Sleep

by Jeffrey Polman

The Exorcist: directed by William Friedkin; screenplay by William Peter Blatty, from his novel.

For those of you who have yet to see the year's most shocking film, the Exorcist, let me inform you that it is perfectly safe to read this article. I will not spoil your eventual premiere viewing by detailing the gruesome scenes, or spelling out the climax.



To sum up the plot, which only a witless cretin could not have heard of by now, the Exorcist is the contemporary tale of a 12-year-old girl who becomes unwillingly possessed by demonic forces. Two priests from the nearby Georgetown Jesuit Seminary are sent to the house to drive the evil out of her, all to the profound dismay of the girl's mother and a police lieutenant named Kinderman (who is trying to solve a freakish murder which may or may not be connected to the possession).

The plot is obviously rather simple. The most interesting aspect of the film is what it has been doing to people who see it. Fainting, vomiting, epileptic fits in the aisles, nervous breakdowns, shock seizures, and a flurry of sleepless nights have been reported symptoms from numerous patrons. This at first might repel you from even getting in line for the thing, but it should be understood that that list is more or less an exaggerated sampling of the crop. Most of the fainting and vomiting cases (I learned this from an usher at the theatre) have been kids who guzzled six-packs or smoked ounces to get themselves off for the film and never made it to the rest room. Nervous breakdowns have been attributed to borderline psychotics or more often people who convinced themselves they were possessed after seeing the film. Shock seizures and epileptic fits did occur, but they have been so few in number that even one would provide an article for a local newspaper.

One symptom I will not deny is the sleepless night. I only suffered through one of them, but I have friends back home who have been up as many as three nights in a row drinking coffee and telling themselves jokes in vain efforts to exorcise the film from their minds.

It is almost a fact that people who have not read the book will be hammered into their seats. The grotesqueness of the images, of the violence and obscenities the demon projects, of simply the idea of a young girl doing all these unspeakable things: those are what can do it. Even hearing from your friends about some of the specific gross-outs is not enough to protect you. Seeing them in full color on a panavision screen is a different story.

For those who have read the book, please try to forget that the book ever existed. The worst possible thing one can do to a movie is compare it to its printed counterpart. I read the book and thought it very chilling. The film stuck to it very closely in plot; only the character developments were not as rich. Too much emphasis on character would have bogged down the pace of the movie. William Blatty, the author of the book and the screenplay, cut out trivial dialogue and collaborated with director William Friedkin to polish up the script so that it dealt almost primarily with the possession and the horror it initiated. I found the film twice as nerve-racking as the book.

Technical magic, however, is what makes the Exorcist. The supernatural atrocities which the demon performs in the girl's bedroom are the most realistic displays of the occult ever put on film. In past horror movies a hairy hand coming through a moonlit window might have been an overly-used image included to try and shock the audience. In the Exorcist, we witness a poltergeist attack in broad daylight. Books, records, and bedclothes fly against the walls as the girl sits on the white-sheeted mattress and speaks in a grisly voice uprooted from the depths of the inferno. We are scared because these horrors are occuring in a perfectly normal, everyday setting. I doubt if the film's effect would have been so widespread if the story took place back in the 15th century.

To comment on the acting, it is superb. Linda Blair as Regan, the possessed girl, undergoes so many layers of macabre makeup and seemingly impossible body spasms that it would be a crime if she didn't win her Oscar on April 2nd. Who would think it possible that a 15-year-old girl could drive nationwide audiences into hysterical fits? Jason Miller, who plays Father Karras, one of the priests, is also fantastic. He portrays just the right amount of paranoid dementia necessary for his role. Max Von Sydow, straight out of Bergman films, plays the aging Exorcist himself, and does very well at that. The sequence near the beginning in which he confronts the demon statue in Northern Iraq will be remembered in nightmares for quite some time. Ellen Burstyn, who plays Chris McNeil, the mother, was better in the Last Picture Show but is still believable here. A little more emotion on her part might have been a help, though.

Finally, I should disgress on the controversy over the film's R rating. To begin with, any parents who are insane enough to bring their youngest ones to this movie deserve all the misery they get. It seemed to me, when I went, that the wrong people were seeing the film. Middle aged ladies strode in with their husbands in a kind of curious-nervous trance, only to come bolting out again within an hour.

No matter what you have heard, or read, or hypothesized about it, the Exorcist is a very well made film which should if not scare the shit out of you, at least leave a lingering sensation of dread deep in your bones. And for those fortunate moviegoers who believe in psychic phenomena, as I do, it is not only a movie. It is reality.

Weekend — WHAT TO DO

Compiled by Eileen McKnight and Arthur Levine

AMERICAN GRAFFITI +++
This film is more than just another nostalgic look into the fifties. It grapples with very real difficulties of growing up and finding a niche for oneself in the adult world. The film recounts the exploits of four friends on the night before they are to go their separate ways; some to college, others to continue to haunt the local street corners. There's a lot of fun and good music, but also some interesting studies of American youth. Playing at the Mountain Farms Mall.

The Big Sleep (1946) ++++
The Howard Hawkes adaptation of the novel by Raymond Chandler, set in the same mold as the Maltese Falcon. It's Bogart and Bacal at their best, with an endless barrage of sexual banter and barbed retorts. The plot defies comprehension, yet for all its confusion it remains one of the slickest detective thrillers ever made. Saturday 7:30 and 9:30, Merrill Science Ctr., Amherst College.

Bride of Frankenstein (1935) +++
A satirical sequel to James Whalis' Frankenstein that is full of dry wit and humor. Boris Karloff is once again the good ol' monster, and is given a companion, Elsa Lancaster. It contains some genuine horror scenes, and is a brilliant parody. Tuesday Lec. Room 3, Merrill Ctr. Amherst College at 7:30 p.m.

Cool Hand Luke (1967) ++++
"Paul Newman brilliantly plays a chain-gang prisoner, a victim of the brutality of his captors along with the indirect cruelty that comes from idolization in the eyes of his fellow prisoners." He continuously makes breaks for freedom and is continuously caught, beaten till his pride and will are destroyed. A winning combination of script by Don Pearce and Frank Pierson, directed by Stuart Rosenberg and acting by Paul Newman. George Kennedy also stars as the top-dog,' and Jo Van Fleet gives a moving protrayal as Newman's mother. Excellent movie at the SUB on Friday, March 15 at 7 and 9:30.

Day For Night (1973) +++
Truffaut's film within a film, about people involved with making a movie and the parallels that can be found of them in the movie 'Meet Pamela.' It gives us the illusion of art and love, and creates an illusion itself. Jean-Pierre and Jacqueline Bisset star in the film exemplifying the trials of shooting a film. Playing at the Showcase in Springfield.

The Exorcist (1973) ++++
William Peter Blatty's story of a young girl possessed by the devil and the horrifying results. Playing at the Show Case in Springfield.

Falstaff Chimes at Night (67) ++
Based on the 5 plays by Shakespear, particularly 'Henry IV', written and directed by Orson Welles. It is the story of Falstaff, a huge, bumbling, blistering baffoon, who is a knight of Henry's and a companion to his son, Prince Hal. The articulation is poor, and the Spanish scenery makes it evident that we are not in England. John Gielund gives a nice performance as Henry IV, as does Keith Baxter as Prince Hal. Welles himself proves disappointing. Playing at the Amherst Cinema.

Girl's Town (1959) +
This film is a typical exploitation film, with a scanty plot. Mamie Van Doren is unjustly accused of murder and sent to Girl's Town. Playing in Room 101 CC Friday, March 15 at 8:00 along with There's No Business Like Show Business, which is a bit more enjoyable.

The Harder They Fall (1956) ++
Bogart's last film before his untimely death. A carbon copy of many earlier fight films, with the usual fixes, underworld characters and sentimentality, but still interesting if only for the performance of Bogart and Rod Steiger. This came at the time of the big uproar to ban boxing as a sport. Sun. at 7:30 Franklin Patterson Hall, Hampshire College.

Hud (1963) +++
Directed by Martin Ritt, the film is a study of one man's tragic flaw. Paul Newman portrays a soulless man who is devoid of principle and responsibility, and driven only by lust. Also in the cast are Brandon DeWilde, Patricia Neal and Melvyn Douglas. Sunday 7:30 in Franklin Patterson Hall, Hampshire College.

Ikiru (1960) ++++
Abounding with profoundly moving insight on the nature of man — life, death, love, selfishness, sacrifice. It's the story of an old man's struggle to give his life meaning when he learns he has only a few months to live. Splendidly produced, beautifully directed, magnificently acted by a huge cast, including Takashi Shimura, Mike Odigvri. Directed by Akirue Kurosawa. Friday 7 and 9:30 in Thompson 106.

Kelly's Heros (1970) ++
The film is graced by four big stars of today, Clint Eastwood, Telly Savalas, Don Rickles and Donald Sutherland, who join together in order to pull a caper during WWII. The film of course, can not stand up to MASH, but does attempt to be a service comedy. Playing Wed. in the CCA at 7 and 10.

Les Enfants Du Paradis (1945) ++++
"(Children of Paradise) recreates the 1830's and the lives of actors and thieves living on the Boulevard du Temple (Paris' famous theatre street). Graced with outstanding performances by Garance, around whom the story unfolds, Pierre Brasseru (as the actor Lemaitre), Louis Salou and Jean-Louis Barrault. Filmed during the German occupation by Marcel Carne." In the West Lecture Hall, Franklin Patterson Hall, Hampshire College on Monday at 8:00.

Long Day's Journey Into Night (1962) ++++
Based on Eugene O'Neill's play; starring Katherine Hepburn. The story brings out all the hidden skeletons contained within each family member of a suburban Connecticut family. Under Sidney Lumet's direction each actor gives their character real life and spark. Ralph Richardson plays the aging father with distinct understanding of his character who becomes a tragic figure. Hepburn plays the mother who is hooked on drugs. Jason Robards and Dean Stockwell play the sons. Playing in the Main Lec. Hall, Franklin, Patterson, Hampshire 7:30.

Love Parade (1929) +++
Lubitsch's first sound film has been justifiably identified as 'the first truly cinematic screen musical in America' by Theodore Huff. It was a great critical and commercial success. In fact, its witty dialogue, delightfully staged songs and visual fluidity make it one of the most memorable musicals of all. This was Jeanette MacDonald's film debut. Playing Tues., Thompson 102 at 7 and 9.

Oh What A Lovely War (1969) +++
A deeply moving film focusing on the tragedy of millions of wasted dead during WWI. Its based on a 1963 musical by John Littlewood, adapted by Len Deighton and Richard AttenBorough. The case includes almost every major British star as John Mills, Lawrence Olivier, Michael Redgrave Etc. Gamble Aud., Saturday at 7:30, Mt. Holyoke.

Our Gang Comedies and the Marx Brothers +++
Come laugh your pants off on Friday at Mahar 7, 9, and 11.

PAPER CHASE +++
A drama exploring the rigors of a Harvard Law school student. Some excellent performances, especially John Houseman as a professor of contractual law. An interesting film, but the melodramatic finish leaves one wondering if the script writer didn't just run out of gas. Mountain Farms Mall.

PAPILLON +++
Steve McQueen and Dustin Hoffman star in this epic adventure film, based on the memoirs of the late Henri Charriere, who at the age of 25 was sentenced to a life of hard labor in the French penal colony of Guiana. Unlike most protagonists in this age of the anti-hero, McQueen displays the virtues which enable him to overcome what appear to be insurmountable hardships and achieve freedom. Sometimes the flashbacks to Charriere's younger days in Paris appear obtuse; still the superb acting of McQueen and the sheer fascination with his struggle for freedom, save the film from mediocrity. Playing at the Calvin.

Rock & Soul '64 Plus a Pink Panther Cartoon
Playing in the SUB Sunday 7 and 9:30.

The Ruling Class (1972) ++++
Peter O'Toole stars and co-produced this film about a gentle Earl of Gurney who believes himself to be Jesus, and is considered mad by his family. He is cured and changes into 'Jack the Ripper' with saddistic, moralistic attitudes viewed by others as normal. Its a black comedy attacking the closed mind and heart and abuses of the priviledged class. Though we've seen many films with the same message, this one is worth seeing. Playing in the CCA Thur., March 21 at 7 and 10.

Siddartha (1973) ++
One of the hardest short novels Hesse has written and the film can not meet the expectations of the book but the visual style is done nicely. Playing at the Academy of Music.

The Sting (1973)

Shaft (1971) ++
The first of the black detective stories, whose success has created uncountable imitations of the original. Richard Roundtree plays a detective with unusual acrobatic ability and remarkable recuperative powers. He's tough, cool, and usually just downright cruel, but still manages to win everyones admiration. Saturday, 7:30 and 9:30 at Sage Hall, Smith.

The Treasure of the Sierra Madre (1948) ++
This highly overrated work of John Houston deals with the age old theme of what greed does to mens' souls. Humphrey Bogart, Tim Holt and Walter Huston are prospectors in search of gold in Mexico. The ending supports the old moral that cheaters never prosper and the same should be said for the moralistic directors. Friday 7:30 and 9:30 Lec. Rm. 1, Merrill Science Ctr., Amherst Col.

A Touch of Class (1973) +++
Glenda Jackson plays the unwed mistress, a liberated woman yet weak enough to fall for George Segal, who himself a married man tries to combine the best of both worlds. One always must lose and naturally it's Ms. Jackson but its fun to watch along the way. Playing at Mountain Farms.

What's Up Tiger Lily (1966) ++
Woody Allen substitutes dubbed English gags for dialogue of a Japanese-made spy film. A very funny premise but just doesn't elicit laughter throughout. Playing with a W.C. Fields short at Mahar Aud., Sat. 7, 9 and 11.

Where Does It Hurt ++
Peter Sellers as Albert T. Hofnagel tries to make a laughing matter out of hospital costs and medical monkeyshines at the Vista Vue Hospital. The basically thin story line is covered by speed, gags, explicit cracks and sex with some athletic performance. Peter Sellers plays the conniving hospital administrator who robs his patients blind. JoAnn Pflug co-stars, best bet is to view this movie in a defracted state of mind.

Woman of the Year (1942) +++
Katherine Hepburn plays an international affairs correspondent on the same newspaper as her husband, Spencer Tracy a baseball correspondent. Their competitiveness along with husband vs. career wife is brilliantly funny due to the Lardner-Kanin screenplay, at Hampshire College, Thurs. along with Long Day's Journey Into Night.

Through A Glass Darkly
A double Bergman bill this week at the Globe in Northampton. First showing will be Through A Glass Darkly which concentrates upon the experiences of people on an isolated island in Sweden within the time span of 24 hrs. Bergman tensly exposes aspects of shock and tragedy that evolve from the painful paraxyms of a young woman going mad. She is an incurable sufferer of schizophrenia. Harriet Anderson beautifully plays the woman, Gunnar Bjornstrand plays the father, and Max Von Sydow as the husband, with Lar Passgard the brother. The Silence will be shown at 8:00 in between showings of ... Glass at 7 and 10:10.

UMass committee formed for human rights in USSR

By BILL DENSMORE
MDC Staff

Eleven members of the UMass community, including faculty, clergy, employees and a student, have joined as founding members of a major effort to secure human rights for Soviet citizens through diplomatic pressure overseas and political pressure of Congress.

Called the "Committee for Human Rights in the Soviet Area", the group includes John Lederle, the former president of UMass who is now a political science professor and has generally stayed away from visible political activity.

Instigator for the effort is UMass professor of Economics Vaclav Holesovsky, who said last week the group was sparked primarily because of the exile of dissident Soviet author Alexsander Solzhenitsyn.

"This is essentially an issue of academic freedom," Holesovsky said Friday, "whether citizens of the Soviet Union have a right to dissent."

In a statement prepared for Tuesday's edition of The Collegian, the Committee says: "we believe that is is wrong as well as dangerous to leave the state of the Soviet domestic regime out of our assessment of international power relations. At the basis of U.S. policy is the search for a stable peace. The totalitarian nature of the Soviet internal regime affects this policy indirectly and directly.

Among the founding members of the group are:

—Arnie Oker, a UMass undergraduate who is politically active in the lettuce boycott.

—John W. Lederle, professor of political science and former UMass president before Robert Wood.

—Rabbi Aryeh Meir of UMass Hillel.

—Father J. Joseph Quigley, Newman Center director.

—Carol H. Drew, dining commons employee and newly-elected president of local 1776 of the AFL-CIO, representing over five-hundred UMass physical plant personnel.

—Howard Brogan, vice-chairman of the English department and one of the major organizers for last falls' unsuccessful faculty unionization attempt by the Massachusetts Teachers' Association.

Other founding members are Harvey Friedman of the UMass Labor Center; Guenther Lewy, professor of political science; Laszlo Tikos, professor of Slavic studies and biographers of Solzhenitsyn; and Bernard Turner, a public safety department employee.

Holesovsky said Friday the group plans a mass letter writing campaign to congressmen asking for:

—increased communication with dissident Russian citizens by the United States, and —Concessions from Soviet diplomats in the area of human rights when trade agreements or defense agreements are reached with the U.S.

"We don't want to leave the students out of this", Holesovsky told the Collegian Friday.

Complete team effort makes gymwomen new Eastern champs

by CANDY GROSS

It wasn't what we all hoped for, but we had to settle for 50 per cent in UMass' Super-weekend.

While 6000 UMies trouped down to New York to raise the roof off Madison Square Garden, almost sure of a UMass victory, 2500 gymnastics fans crowded the Cage (the one side that was used due to space limitations) hopeful of a UMass victory, but deep down expectant of a Springfield victory. The Chiefs had defeated UMass in a dual meet earlier in the season, and had never lost an Eastern Championships, so a bet on Springfield would have been a safe one.

But in Friday's team competition, the Minutewomen not only beat Springfield and sixteenother schools to win their first Eastern Championship, but they came up with a brilliant team effort to win by the impressive margin of 3.15 points, 106.20 to 103.05.

It was the final session from 8:30-10:00 on Friday night which drew a capacity crowd to watch the top four teams in the east: UMass, Springfield, Southern Connecticut, and Towson State.

But from the reaction of the audience, it almost seemed as if there were only two teams competing; as it developed into a duel between UMass and Springfield fans. The Cage reverberated with the crowd's undampened excitement, despite futile efforts to control the noise. This was probably the most crowd involvement seen at a women's gymnastics meet in years.

The session began with UMass on uneven bars and Springfield on floor exercise, strong events for both teams.

Gail McCarthy led off for UMass and swung perhaps her strongest routine to earn a rather low 7.35, possibly due to her first place position in the line-up. Freshman Linda Nelligan followed her with a 7.5. Margie Combs, back to her All Around position, worked the bars with ease to score an 8.4, after which Anne Vexler flashed through her crowd-pleasing routine to an 8.85. Bar specialist, Betsy East kept the pace going with an 8.8 and Jeannine Burger wrapped up the event with her 9.0. The last four women qualified for the individual

Cause launched for "9-year-old" convict

By MARK VOGLER

A group of UMass students have launched a campaign to reopen the case of a former Belchertown State School inmate who is serving a life sentence at Norfolk Prison for a murder conviction.

The students have planned "Russell Daniels Night" April 3 at the UMass campus center in an attempt to "encourage" Gov. Francis W. Sargent to appoint a citizen's commission to investigate the circumstances surrounding the incarceration of the 28-year-old mentally retarded man.

Daniels, who worked as a janitor in a Springfield apartment building, was alleged to have stabbed to death an 83-year-old woman August 21, 1972.

He was convicted on a confession statement which he later testified Springfield police had forced him to sign.

The statement which Daniels said he could not understand was the main evidence brought against him by Dist. Atty. John J. Teahan in Hampshire County Superior Court.

Daniels, a black, was tried before an all-white jury.

Susan Sherry, a UMass student and coordinator for the scheduled event, told the Collegian the group hopes to use the Daniels case to create a public awareness to the state's need for better health care services.

"We would like to raise the issue as to why the Department of Mental Health is not fulfilling is responsibility to the citizens of this state," Ms. Sherry said.

SEE NEWS ANALYSIS — PAGE 10

"Social services in general should be an issue in this year's state elections. Citizens should be forcing government bureaucracies to become more accountable to those they serve."

The group has been advised by former state Corrections Commissioner John Boone not to limit the seminar to the Daniels case because "five to ten per cent of Massachusetts' prison population is incarcerated under the same circumstances — and should be treated as mentally retarded," Ms. Sherry said.

The group plans to ask Gov. Sargent to attend.

Expected guest speakers include Dr. Benjamin Ricci, President of the Belchertown State School Friends Association; Alto Daniels, a UMass student and brother of the retarded convict, Joe Klein of the Real Paper, the only Boston publication to follow the story; and a representative of the National Commission on the Abolition of Prisons which Boone now heads.

"The 9-year-old in Norfolk," WTIC-TV's (Hartford) investigative documentary of the Daniel's case, will also be shown during the evening.

Ms. Sherry said the group also hopes to point out "questionable" police practices in Springfield "which justifies an investigation by a citizen's group of both black and white."

Bicycles: Free to go as you please but watch out for the rules

Spring is here!

By FRITS GEURTSEN
MDC Staff

(First in a three-part series on Bicycling)

It's bicycles, and not robins or flower buds, that announce the advent of spring at UMass. With the coming of warmer weather, literally thousands of cyclists appear on the scene, riding on bikes worth anywhere from $4 to $400.

Although cyclists are for the most part free to do and go as they please, there are a few rules and regulations that apply to them.

Cyclists must obey the same traffic rules and regulations as automobiles to the extent that they are reasonably applicable. This includes riding on the right, obeying signs, giving signals, and so forth.

Riders must proceed in single file except on bike paths or sections of the highway set aside exclusively for bicycles. No bicycle is permitted to be drawn by another moving vehicle.

Only one person is allowed on a bicycle, except in those cases where a bicycle is designed to hold more than one person.

Any bicycle operated during the period from half an hour after sunset to half an hour before sunrise must be equipped with a white headlight and a red reflector in the rear.

The headlight must be visible for five hundred feet; the reflector, not less than three hundred. In addition relflectorized paint or tape must be displayed on the lower portion of the rear fender and on both sides of the front fork.

Every bicycle must be equipped with a suitable bell, horn, or other device which emits a signal capable of being heard at least one hundred feet away. Sirens and whistles are illegal.

All bikes must have brakes which allow the rider to stop quickly and evenly.

Violation of any of these rules and regulations if punishable by a fine of one dollar.

Many communities have their own additional rules concerning bicycles. These may include ones dealing with riding on sidewalks and the like. The best rule of thumb when riding in strange towns is common sense.

Thinking about B'town School

By DONALD WILHELM
MDC Staff

Belchertown State School is a place you sort of hear about but don't know much about. In order to know a bit more about the place, I volunteered in "K" Building, where the school's most retarded patients live.

A day in a patient's life involves getting up at 6:30 a.m., having breakfast, going to a large room called a "day-hall", going to lunch, going back to the day-hall, going to dinner, and going to bed at 7:00 p.m. The day hall is a large room with a few chairs, a table, a broken television, and little else. Two attendants are present to take care of over 40 people. The patients literally have the age of one-year-olds--few can speak, many aren't toilet-trained, and most don't communicate with each other. But occasionally you see some affection between them, some gentle strokes.

The wierd expressions and odd gestures of these people make them unappealing. And it is extremely difficult to communicate with them. They often don't know what you want, and you can't understand what they're trying to say. However, both due to their gentle nature, and, when necessary, due to tranquilizers, the patients are pretty harmless. There are few violent cases.

With the high patient attendant ratio, relations between the mare by necessity distant. The sheer bizarreness of the situation, for hours on end, makes one want to keep one's distance from the patients - it is too depressing, too threatening, to be with them, and when virtually everyone in a room of people is very very strange, one feels very insecure in a funny way.

Ten years ago, two attendants cared for 120 patients and clubs were used to maintain order. Even today, shoving and whacking clothing at people is often the only way many can find to keep from being overwhelmed by the patients. Attendants told the reporter that with more staff, the situation would be much easier, but often legislators don't care.

Even to an extent today, state mental facilities are the places budget cuts are made when the budget needs streamlining. With so many causes in our state crying for funding, mental patients, who are not exactly a massive voting bloc, often get short shrift. Attendants also said that of all the patients in "K" Building, only one received a regular visitor, and only three or four received sporadic visitors.

And many of the residents are sons of doctors, lawyers, and professors, people supposedly educated enough to know better. But it is admittedly heart-rending to be in a room of deformed humanity, an experience many people would just as soon avoid. It is difficult to love these people.

Most of the building has the look of someone's trying--there are decorations, fresh paint, new furniture,aand a ward for older people in which the staff-patient ratio is five to one. It is a much saner, happier place in this room than in the main day hall. And more people than ever are being sent into the world, more people are being helped and trained for life on the outside. But so much more needs to be done.

It's often said that money makes the world go round. And money would work wonders at Belchertown. It is easier, more comfortable to forget these people, then to forget Roxbury, or to forget starvation. You don't see these problems often. But a mentally-retarded person, whose life revolves around three rooms, whose life consists of pacing back and forth until the next meal, can't ever forget.

Safety director sees need for emergency vehicle

By FRITS GUERTSEN
MDC Staff

"Everyone recognizes the need for an emergency vehicle in this area", said David Johnston, Director of Public Safety for the University recently.

"There have been countless instances," he said, "where emergencies have occurred and we've wasted a lot of precious time rounding up the necessary equipment to deal with the situation. An emergency vehicle that contained such equipment would be indispensible, due to its quick response time."

Paul E. Tartaglia, an Assistant Professor in the Mechanical Engineering Department on campus, is in the process of determining exactly what would be needed on such a vehicle and what type of vehicle would be best suited for the task.

"The vehicle," he said, "will definitely contain such things as an electrical generator, cutting torches, barricades, emergency lights, and ropes. What we're trying to do right now is figure out what pieces of equipment would be most necessary."

Tartaglia emphasized that the vehicle would provide a service that was over and above that of an ambulance or patrol car, and would be supportive of their work, not duplicating it.

"Our ideas right now are running along the lines of something no bigger than a van. I think four-wheel drive is a necessity for it, especially in the winter months. We're considering special add-on trailers that can be hooked on behind in the case of special emergencies — such as maybe one with scuba gear."

Johnston, who is also Director of Civil Defense on campus, predicted that the vehicle would be used by the police or Civil Defense at least once a week.

The vehicle is still in the planning stages since it lacks funds.

"Although the University recognizes the need for such a vehicle," said Johnston, "it has a very low priority as far as the budget is concerned. We're hoping to tap sources of funds that are not a drain on the budgets of individual departments or the University. We're hoping for government funding."

Tartaglia added "We can cut a lot of costs by purchasing a government surplus vehicle and by utilizing the expertise and manpower of people on this campus, but we still need some kind of seed money to start the actual research."

Tartaglia said that University students would be involved in the research and eventual "building, testing, and debugging" of the vehicle. Students doing such work would receive credit as a special project. He added that this was not limited to engineering students.

Tartaglia outlined a rough timetable of events. "If we get the seed money, we should be able to do all the research and background work this summer. Then in September we can start actual work on the vehicle and hopefully it would be finished within a calendar year. Everything depends on the extent to which we are funded and how soon we can really get going."

Health Service fee to increase

By BILLY NEMITZ
MDC Staff

The Health Services Student Advisory Board voted unanimously Thursday to support a $7.50 increase in the student health fee over the next two years. The increase was approved earlier last week by the Rents and Fees Committee.

According to Barry Averill, Health Services director, the need for additional funds stems from Health Services plans to provide Dental Health with an Eye-Care Program, and a Women's Health Care Program along with the general improvement of several existing services.

The increase was originally proposed in the Health Serives budget for the upcoming fiscal year, but was taken into reconsideration due to Chancellor Bromery's request that all University fee increases be held to a minimum.

As a result of the Health Services review, a number of alternatives were considered, the major one being a $4.50 increase over a one year period, using the Health Services' cash reserves to make up the difference. However, after one year the fee would be subject to additional increase, which many feel would, in the long run, consititute an overall increase larger than the one which has been approved for the next two years.

In addition to its projected economic advantages, the $7.50 increase also carries guarantees that pharmaceutical medication will remain free and that the fee will not rise in the next two years.

The proposal will now be sent with the approval of both the Advisory Board and the Rents and Fees Committee to the Administration. Chancellor Bromery was unavailable for comment, but Vice Chancellor Gage told the Collegian Friday that "We (the Administration) will want to honor the students' wishes as far as the level of fee increase is concerned."

Dr. Gage continued that the health fee increase proposes less difficulty than others because it affects all of the students, while other increases pose problems due to the fact that they deal only with specialized groups.

Should the proposal meet the expected approval of the Administration, it will then be reviewed by the Board of Trustees, the final stop before its actual implementation. All of those along the way feel that the $7.50 increase will become a part of the forthcoming Health Services budget.

SW confronts Apostola

The Southwest Assembly last week decided to confront Nick Apostola, Student Government President, on his responsibilities as President.

Larry St. Cyr, President of SW Government, reported that the other area presidents, and himself, had discussed Apostola at a President Council meeting. It was the general consensus of the body that Apostola was not going his job.

The two major complaints dealt with Apostola's stand on the parking issue and the fact he had not gone to any area government meetings, as he is supposed to.

It seems, that as student trustee on the Board of Trustees, Apostola supported the parking plan decided on during the summer. However, in the fall, when the students and workers, opposed the plan, so did Apostola.

According the the area presidents, it is the duty of the Student Government President to attend a few of the area government meetings. The Commuter Assembly claims they don't even know what Apostola looks like, and the other areas share a similar complaint.

At a special meeting, to be held tomorrow night at 7:30, the SW Assembly will ask President Apostola to defend himself against written charges.

Basie: from "Bijou to Ballroom"

By DOROTHY L. MULLER
MDC Staff

Count "Bill" Basie, one of the last of the great jazz men, ambles into the Duke room of the Student Union, tenderly gosled by a small flock of faithfuls. He eases his custom tailored frame slowly into a seat two chairs away from the nearest reporter sliding a rumpled captain's hat on the table. And he waits.

The man who started out as a pianoplayer in a Kansas City silent movie house "never thought about a career other than music. Everybody at the office was worried in the beginning - the manager - everybody. But when you're young everything's allright." And now, after the years of the European tours, the swing sound of the big bands, of names like Duke Ellington and Benny Goodman, "I wouldn't want them to take me and put me in a corner."

Bill Basie, the swing maestro of the 30's and 40's, reminisces over the years when the drummer laid down the 4-to-a-bar beat and the band first set a riff behind the reeds weaving brilliant improvisations. He remembers the times when "An old jazz man" on a jabbering trombone would blow a horn duet with a "kid" on a screeching sax. And the band bounced the riff around till they created what Down Beat called "hot jazz."

Bill Basie, the Fats Waller styled pianist, won't take credit for the swinging elliptical keyboard style that made him internationally famous. But Basie's piano solos with their striding down-beat, upbeat style and the right hand improvisations made chromatic triplets a jazz cliche.

Since taxes and television closed the nightclubs, the Count plays the college circuits now. And they're "moving along pretty good, doing better this year than last" because of the nostalgia revival.

A diamond pinky ring winks in the light as the Count unwraps a fine narrow cigar. Internationally known as the "king" of the best, Count Bill Basie quietly admits that although jazz is like a cake, "you have to have all the right ingrediants", he is not the one who makes it gel. The arrangements and compositions now are the work of several band musicians, and the alto sax sets the tempo. Tamping out his cigar, he refers to himself as a "pianoplayer they let in every now and then."

Harlow claims Nixon helping judiciary panel focus study

WASHINGTON (AP) — Presidential advisor Bryce Harlow says that by resisting efforts of the House Judiciary Committee to gain access to its files, the White House is trying to help the committee focus its impeachment inquiry.

Until the committee decides what an impeachable offense is and draws up specific charges against President Nixon based on that definition, Harlow says, the investigation will wander aimlessly, creating the risk of a constitutional impasse.

Harlow, one of Nixon's top aides, said in an interview that the White House is not being recalcitrant or trying to hide anything by refusing to open White House files to the committee or to respond to its request for tapes of 42 presidential conversations.

"It is an attempt to help them, in a way, to decide specifically what they are trying to do," he said. "As it is now, they have no anchor to what they are trying to do."

Harlow's stated views reflected a fundamental disagreement with the Judiciary Committee, which regards the drawing of any charges against Nixon as the final step of its inquiry and one that cannot be taken until it has examined all available evidence.

The nature of the disagreement can be seen in the following exchange, which dealth with Harlow's repeated references to a need for the committee to be more specific in its requests for information.

Q. What about the request for 42 tapes of presidential conversations. That is specific. It mentions dates, hours even, and people.

A. Those are actual discussions, yes, but what are they relevant to?

Q. The committee thinks they relate to the Watergate coverup.

A. How?

Q. They want to hear them to find out.

A. I understand. Of course they do.

Q. How can they determine relevancy?

A. They have a staff of 101. They're busy, able people. I think they'd love to have those tapes to see if they might be relevant to something.

Sirica must retire upon reaching 70

WASHINGTON (AP) — The polished brass plate on the door that reads "Office of the Chief Judge" comes down Tuesday and John J. Sirica once more will be just another of 15 district judges in the courthouse.

The plate will be moved to the chambers of Judge George L. Hart Jr., and with it the trappings of chief judge: administrator, shepherd of grand juries, assigner of cases, including Watergate.

For Sirica, who turns 70 Tuesday and therefore must relinquish the post, it means his first vacation in 18 months — very nearly the span of the Watergate case that lifted him from obscurity.

"I've been pretty active, as you know, as chief judge," Sirica said in something of an understatement, even as he was writing one of his most important decisions.

That decision, expected Monday, will be whether the House of Representatives gets access to the secret report that accompanied the Watergate grand jury's cover-up indictment.

"All I can say it's a very important decision," Sirica said. "I'm not going to try and compare it with an other decision."

But inevitably it will be compared with his historic ruling of last Aug. 29 that forced President Nixon to submit the White House Watergate tape recordings to Sirica for review — and eventually for the grand jury.

AP news roundup

Portuguese rebels

LISBON, Portugal (AP) — The government announced yesterday the arrest of up to 30 army officers after an abortive attempt by dissident soldiers to march on Lisbon and overthrow the government.

Among them was Lt. Col. Joao Almeida Bruno, a close friend of ousted generals Antonio de Spinola and Francisco Costa da Gomes, the former chief of staff.

All three have received Portugal's highest military decorations, and were honored at the military academy in Lisbon only last week. Bruno served with Spinola when the controversial general commanded forces in Portuguese Guina.

Loyal troops kept an armed grip on Portugal yesterday. Soldiers were posted at military installations and communications centers, but the nation appeared calm.

The uprising was crushed early Saturday without a shot when loyal army units stopped a motorized rebel column near Lisbon. The estimated 200 rebels remained under heavy guard at the 5th Infantry Regiment barracks 60 miles north of Lisbon.

Cambodia fighting

PHNOM PENH, Cambodia (AP) — The Cambodian war enters its fifth year today with the brightest hope for peace resting on deplomatic help from the world's powers or a battlefield stalemate that would force warring factions to the conference table.

The North Vietnamese, Americans and others — with their own interests at stake — prop up and direct the fighting sides.

The U.S. price tag of shaping the future of Cambodia now runs more than $1.6 million a day in military and economic aid. It is perhaps this aid which has allowed the Phnom Penh government to survive and bring the war to a point where neither side is strong enough to win.

Labor voting test

LONDON (AP) — A revolt in the opposition Conservative party seems likely to ensure Prime Minister Harld Wilson's survival in the first voting test of Britain's new Parliament, political sources said Sunday.

The vote is due tonight on a motion criticizing the Labor government's abandonment of statutory wage controls. If Wilson survives as forecast, the vote would prove an embarrassment and possible danger for Conservative leader Edward Heath.

The vote comes at the end of a debate on the Wilson government's program for Parliament. It includes higher pensions and an attempt to control wages by voluntary cooperation with trade unions.

Disengagement talks

Israel said yesterday it assigned Defense Minister Moshe Dayan to begin talks in Washington with Syria to separate their armies on the Golan Heights where fighting raged for the sixth straight day.

Syria said four of its soldiers were killed and 12 wounded in the clashes, but that its forces killed or wounded several Israeli troops. Israel reported no casualties.

Damascus also said Syrian gunners knocked out 18 Israeli artillery batteries, three antitank rocket bases, five tanks, a number of armored vehicles, two ammunition dumps, one radar station and 20 observation posts.

Black caucus rejects bid to form national party

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. (AP) — After lengthy debate, black leaders and organizers at a political convention voted yesterday to table a controversial proposal for formation of a national black political party.

The voice vote to table followed proposals by the Louisiana and Ohio delegations for an outright objection of the motion proposed by the Georgia delegation.

Spokesmen for the two delegations said ideological differences among blacks made formation of a third major political party impractical at this time.

The vote at the Black National Political Convention followed an earlier resolution criticizing the national Democratic party for allegedly failing to include blacks in meaningful decision-making processes.

Conference Coconvenor Imamu Baraka suggested to the Georgia delegation that it redraft the party motion and submit it for discussion at a scheduled meeting in September.

Nine resolutions were approved during the windup session of the three-day convention organized largely by black nationalists.

Delegates voted to create a National Black United Fund with a goal of raising $17.5 million within three years to support black political causes.

The convention passed, over the objection of the New York delegation, a New Jersey resolution condemning members of Congress who voted for the $2.2 billion military aid for Israel. The resolution accused the Israelis of depriving the Palestinians of their homeland.

The delegates also called for: the establishment of a legal defense system and the raising of funds to help imprisoned black activists.

The energy crisis

Oil customers were wrong

BEIRUT, Lebanon (AP) — When the Arabs closed the oil spigot last October, their customers confidently predicted, "They need us more than we need them. They can't drink the stuff."

The customers were wrong. The embargo has aggravated an energy crisis that was already on its way, leading to fuel shortages and price hikes.

Although the political effects of the embargo will be debated for a long time, it has had enormous economic repercussions and changed lifestyles in the industrialized world.

Some European and American homes were cold this winter. Long lines formed at gas stations, speed limits were reduced on U.S. highways, Daylight Saving Time was restored and carless Sundays in European capitals became common.

The U.S. car industry was hard hit by declining big car sales resulting in layoffs. The big three U.S. automakers don't blame the embargo for all their troubles but say "consumer uncertainty" has driven some buyers off the market.

Fuel shortages created a recession in many industries, prompting many of Washington's European friends to trample on old alliances in an anti-Israeli stampede to Arab capitals to sew up bilateral oil deals.

Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger now has to produce a military disengagement between Syria and Israel in the Golan Heights and eventually a durable peace settlement in the Middle East.

Sheikh Ahmed Zaki Yamani, Harvard-educated oil minister for Saudi Arabia, prime mover in the embargo, told a Cairo newspaper last week the Arabs "would not hesitate to use the oil weapon again if it became necessary."

Yamani said the embargo "had produced the first significant change in U.S. policy in the Middle East in 25 years."

His opinion is not shared by Israeli Foreign Minister Ebba Eban, who contends that U.S. policy "has been no different as a result of the embargo than it would have been without the embargo."

Both Saudi Arabia's King Faisal and Egyptian President Anwar Sadat were ready to lift the boycott after Kissinger achieved an Israeli pullback on the Suez Canal front and arranged high-level talks in Washington on Syrian-Israeli disengagement in the Golan Heights.

They apparently were convinced that the Arabs had established their credibility with the embargo, that the United States, although inconvenienced, would eventually learn to get along without Arab oil and that therefore the pressure for further disengagement and a peace settlement would decrease.

Yamani hinted in an interview last week that the Arabs have received private assurances from Washington there would be more progress. He said, "We cannot divulge all. But we in Arab governments are convinced the United states now is playing an active role for peace."

Hardliners like Libya remain opposed to ending the embargo because they feel the goals for which it was imposed last October will not be achieved. Algeria at first shared this view but came over to the majority side after assuring itself that Egypt and Saudi Arabia were not trying to railroad a decision.

Embargo agreement still not reached

VIENNA, Austria (AP) — The oil ministers from nine Arab countries failed to agree yesterday on lifting the oil embargo against the United states and decided to meet again today.

The Arab ministers met after they and four other members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries OPEC, the world's largest oil producing nations, decided to extend their freeze on oil prices for three months.

A Saudi Arabian official had said earlier Sunday that the freeze cleared the way for a lifting of the embargo, but after the Arab ministers met on their own it became apparent there still were disagreements on the embargo.

Informed sources said some of the ministers, particularly the Syrians, wanted to confer with their governments before proceeding further. The sources said leaders of the Arab countries are expected to be in contact with one another before the Monday session to settle some differences.

The ministers, representing members of the Organization of Arab Oil Producing Countries OPEC, met for 3½ hours at a Vienna hotel most of the time without their aides present.

Sources said Libya, a strong opponent of ending the boycott, displayed little opposition during the session, and at times was forced to defend itself against reports that Libyan oil has been reaching the United States through third nations.

Egypt and Saudi Arabia, the leading Arab oil producer, were reported pushing for an end to the boycott that was imposed against the United States and the Netherlands last October because of the two countries' policy toward Israel.

Algeria has been reported in favor of lifting the embargo for two months pending the outcome of negotiations on a Middle East peace settlement. The United States is playing a key role on troop disengagement negotiations on the Israeli-Syrian front.

Syria was believed one of the strongest opponents of ligting the embargo, seeking to have a troop disengagement pact signed with Israel before ending the obycott.

The decision by the 13-member OPEC to continue the freeze on petroleum prices was described by a spokesman as a good will gesture toward the leading oil consumers — Western Europe, Japan and the United States. But he warned that prices would again be raised if the industrial nations do not control inflation.

The president of the two-day OPEC conference, Finance Minister Jamshid Amouzegar of Iran, complained that inflation in the industrialized countries was an average 12 per cent last year.

"This would justify increasing the price of oil to the tune of at least 12 per cent to compensate for inflation," he told newspersons.

"We have decided to show good will not to increase the price of oil for another three months provided the industrialized countries would contain their galloping inflation," he added.

OPEC imposed a price freeze at a meeting in Geneva, Switzerland, in January. The freeze was due to end April 1.

In the United States, gasoline prices are expected to remain roughly at what they are now. Under the regulations of the Federal Energy Office in Washington, oil companies adjust their wholesale gasoline prices once a month depending on the price of crude oil.

Another factor in the decision, experts said, was the recent dampening in market prices of oil, a signal that the oil producers could not go on charging more without limit.

St. Pat's soul food

BOSTON (AP) - A black state representative served soul food and corned beef and cabbage at his own St. Patrick's Day dinner yesterday after Irish politicians cancelled their traditional get-together to protest school busing.

In Irish Boston, dozens of state politicians from the governor on down have met for generations at a little restaurant on St. Patrick's Day to at dinner and exchange political witicisms.

But this year, the state legislators from South Boston where the restaurant, called Dergan's, is located, said the spector of school busing to achieve racial balance had soured the possiblity of any festive gatherings.

So Rep. Royal Belling, who says the only difference between black and Irish is the beat of their music, invited the politicians into his part of town to sample black-eye peas, greens and barbequed chicken, as well as more traditional St. Patrick's Day fare.

But only about a half dozen white state legislators ventured into the predominently black neighborhood to eat Belling's dinner at a Masonic Hall.

Belling noted that people at the State House had been "squirming" for the past week about whether to go. He said he was disappointed by the turnout.

But the point of the whole thing, he said, was to show whites that the black community is "hanging loose on the busing controversy."

Logan expansion

BOSTON (AP) - City officials from Boston and Chelsea are prepared to square off against aviation officials over a proposed new landing system at Logan Airport.

The Massachusetts Port Authority and the Federal Aviation Administration favor the new landing system, saying it would mean more convenient air service.

But city officials are opposing the move on environmental grounds.

The new runways would require the filling of 18 acres of wetlands near East Boston, which environmentalists say could raise pollution levels at nearby Constitution Beach.

The Boston Air Pollution Control Commission alleges the installation would also increase air pollution in the area.

Transportation secretary Aln Altshuler said the new landing system could be installed at a cost of some $2 million for each of two proposed runways.

"We will not be panicked into doing this immediately as Mass Port wishes," Altshuler said, "nor do we agree with the community's total opposition. We have been balancing all factors in our decision and it's been a close call."

Quincy dockstrike

QUINCY (AP) - Shipbuilding workers picketed the Quincy Shipyard of the General Dynamics Corp. on yesterday after they went on strike at midnight Saturday.

A spokesman for Local 5 of the Shipbuilding Workers Union said yesterday that there had been no movement toward reopening negotiations after they broke off just before the walkout.

About 1,300 of the union's 1,700 members voted to go on strike after a spokesman said the company's latest contract offer was "totally inadequate."

The union is asking for a $1.80 an hour across-the-board increase for all workers, as well as a 25 cent-an-hour cost of living increase.

A union spokesman said the company had offered a 55 cent increase over three years, which would have brought highest rated mechanics in the yard to $5.09 and the lowest to $3.92 by May, 1976.

Refinery in R.I.?

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) - Gov. Philip Noel Rhode Island would eagerly welcome jobs provided by an oil refinery, but must cautiously examine its impact on the environment.

In his second session this week with developers proposing major projects for Rhode Island, Noel and community leaders met more than an hour Thursday with Demetrios B. Haseotes, who has proposed construction of a refinery and steel mill on surplus Navy land and a depot on Gould Island for unloading oil from supertankers.

Noel gave no commitment to Haseotes, whose, family owns the chain of Cumberland Farms convenience stores. But Haseotes said, "I get the felling they're going to welcome this proposal." Asked what impression was given by community representatives, he said, "I think they ant us to come in."

Noel described Haseotes' proposal as "very interesting" but added, "It's far too preliminary to ay we favor the proposal."

Wellesley grant

WELLESLEY (AP) - U. S. Ambassador to Switzerland Shelby Cullom Davis has given $750,000 to Wellesley College to establish a professorship in Slavic studies at the school.

The gift was made in honor of the ambassador's wife, Kathryn Waterman Davis of Wellesley, Class of '28.

This is the second professorship the ambassador and his wife have given to Wellesley. In 1962 they helped establish the Edith Stix Wasserman professorship in Asian Studies, given in honor of Mrs. Davis' mother, an 1897 graduate of Wellesley.

MIT tunnel research

CAMBRIDGE (AP) - Laser beams and ultrasonic vibrating drills may ecome common equipment for tunneling underground because of a computer system designed to evaluate new burrowing methods and determine which are most promising for research.

Scientists at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology are involved in a study to use computers to get reliable cost and time estimates of tunneling projects.

With such a system, researchers could preview the 20 to 30 proposals being considered for super drilling systems and determine which are promising enough to merit expensive research and development.

Tunneling is big business that consistently is plagued with time and cost overruns.

Dr. Fred Meavenzadeh, professor of civil engineering at MIT, is the principal investigator in a three-year, $400,000 National Science Foundation project to develop ways to evaluating new tunneling techniques.

"The traditional tunneling and excavation methods are slow and expensive, and therefore economically risky," Meavenzadeh says. Traditional methods include blasting with explosives, digging trenches above ground and later covering them, and using huge rotor boring machines that chew through rocks and dirt.

Meavenzadeh says new techniques are needed as demands for tunnels and excavations increase. Soem 60 major tunneling projects, such as mountain passes, underwater tunnels and subway systems, are udderway in the United States alone, he says, at a total estimated cost of $2.5 billion.

Dentists at BU help use space technology

BOSTON (AP) - The idea of replacing lost teeth with artificial ones has been around since ancient Egyptians tried roorting ivory in their jaws and medieval oral artisans tried plugging in dentures of gold and silver.

The state of the art improved over the centuries up to today's tooth implants of exotic metal alloys and polymer plastics, but even these have been less than overwhelmingly successful. Scientific controversy continues over what method is the best approach to the long-awaited artificial teeth.

Researchers working with new surgical techniques and a super carbon material developed for the nozzles of rocket engines are experimenting with a new, and sometimes controversial, approach that they say should bring the hoped for permanent implant a giant step closer.

Dentists at the Clinical Research Center of Boston University School of Graduate Dentistry are among researchers at a handful of American centers working with vitreous carbon, a highly purified, super-strong material that is unusually compatible with body tissues.

Dr. Richard E. Stallard, director of the BU center, and Dr. J. Henry Skerman, have used vitreous carbon implants to replace tooth roots in about 55 patients in the past two years. The researchers say the implants were successful in all but five cases, and these at the beginning of their work.

Stallard says the vitreous carbon appears to get along with the body causing little or no evident tissue inflammation and no evidence so far of rejection, which is often the case when foreign material is put into the body.

But he and his colleague note that their longest running implant is just over two years old and more time is needed to observe how well the implants holds up with time.

Stallard and Skerman's enthusiasm for vitreous carbon isn't shared by all dental authorities. The American Dental Association's Council on Materials and Devices has labled the vitreous carbon implant "experimental" and cautions that much more work is needed to judge the material's safety and effectiveness.

Popular base nessessary to Greek student movement

By STEVE MCMAHON

In Athens three months ago, fifteen hundred Greek students marched against the troops, tear gas and tanks of then President Papadopoulos in an effort to rally the citizenry against the former strongman's rule. Thirteen people died and approximately five hundred were wounded in the clash which one week later expedited the military's removal of Papadopoulos. While the reforms for which the students protested did not accompany the president's overthrow, Greek students emerged as a potent and viable political force.

Unfortunately, the students' newfound political muscle inevitably turned into a liability. Sensing that the students represented a threat to their authority, the military regime has initiated a systematic repression of idssent. The proposal for a February seventeenth student strike resulted in the preventive arrests of some one hundred student activists; an action which substantially muted student protest, at least temporarily. The regime has apparently fallen back on the oft-used vindication that student activism was being promoted by communist subversives, (a tactic used with some frequency by leaders in the U.S. to undermine Vietnam dissent). Armed with this rationale, the government has recently announced the arrest of twenty-two additional students as well as thirteen alleged leaders of the KKE, the outlawed Greek Communist Party.

The fact that the government is intent upon suppressing dissent by whatever means necessary is substantiated by Greek and American students and scholars who have recently returned from Greece, including Prof. George Wald and several other Nobel laureates. There have been several reports by these people citing the establishment of a torture center within sight of the U.S. embassy in Athens. In addition, there have been numerous reports concerning the conscription of dissidents into the army as well as the institution of deportation camps designed to crush the student movement.

In the face of these many obstacles, the student movement has been diminished, or at least been rendered less visible. In spite of this fact, the Greek students seem to have maintained their resolve to alter the face of their government. Initially, student demands revolved around primarily academic concerns such as the removal of informers from the campus, the institution of freely-elected student councils, and the abolition of a variety of restrictive university laws. In time, however, they came to realize that these goals could not be attained without a return to democratic Rule for all of Greek society. Students are now clamoring for a broader program of social reform including the placement of capital investment in the hands of Greeks for the first time in their history. They now argue that the new leadership must come from within the movement, and that Greek independence (including independence from Nato and the U.S.), must be established and maintained. The students hardly place a premium on the retention of U.S. favors. They apparently feel (with some justification) that the U.S. has served only to shore up one Greek dictatorship after another.

While one can readily sympathize with the aims of the Greek student movement, one must realize that revolutions, either peaceful or violent, are not over-night affairs. They require diligence and near-fanatical devotion by the participants; a devotion born of a deep belief in the worthiness of their cause. Without this essential ingredient the regeneration of democracy in a land which gave birth to that noble concept cannot possibly occur.

The issue is not whether the students are justified in their aspirations, but whether they possess the moral conviction to fulfill their goals. Students and the intellectual community as a whole are by their very nature erratic in terms of revolutionary participation. All too often they are capable of reckless sacrifices over a short period of time, but fail to retain the momentum for the protracted ordeal that lies ahead. For precisely this reason, a successful refolution by this sensitive strata of Greek society is dubious. While Mao Tse-tung's dictum that intellectuals are the "fair-weather friends of revolution" is perhaps a bit unfair, it does not lie far from the truth.

Despite these inherent drawbacks, intellectuals serve as the primary motive force behind revolution. In essence, if the students are to achieve real changes in Greek government, they must be willing to suffer innumerable adversities, including the possibility of death. Of at least equal importance, however, is the need for students to actively attempt the popularization of their cause. No revolution can possibly succeed if it is relegated to an intellectual elite. The base of the revolutionary cadre must be broadened to include a considerable bulk of the population. This essential goal can only be attained by making the students' goals identifiable with the interests of the society at large; a most difficult task in such a fragmented society with a history of military domination.

Letters To The Editor

Sorry, no can do

To The Editor:

I regret to inform you that, due to complicated surgery on my wife, who has just returned from the hospital after a two week stay, I am unable to appear at the University of Massachusetts at any time in the near future. She needs constant care and I wouldn't consider leaving her. I'm awfully sorry about this for I was looking forward to appearing at the university. May I look forward to appearing the following May.

Regretfully,

Caucus, yes; Guzzi, no

To The Editor:

In the interests of fair play, I am writing in response to a recent column by Reid Fishman. In his column, Fishman stressed the importance of the upcoming Mass Caucus '74, which will take place on March 23 in Framingham, and will endorse candidates for Attorney General and Secretary of the Commonwealth. Fishman also urged interested persons to contact Ellen Riegal for further information. While attempts to increase people's participation in government are commendable, I feel it only fair to point out that Miss Riegal is also the campus campaign manager for Rep. Paul Guzzi of Newton, a candidate for Secretary of the Commonwealth. We ask that the Collegian give all viable candidates an equal opportunity. We believe that Boston City Councillor Lawrence S. DiCara is also a serious challenger and worthy of support on March 23. The Mass Caucus is an important event which affords an unprecedented chance to reach many previously apathetic people and increase their interest and involvement in state government and the electoral process. We ask that all students who wish to have further information and details about Mass Caucus '74 or simply wish to discuss the aims and purposes of the caucus to contact us at either 546-4388 or 545-2162.

Gay lobby needed

To The Editor:

The Time is now for flooding the State House with letters and-or telephone calls in support of the five Gay rights bills. As for Rep. James Collins of Amherst, and Sen. Olver of Amherst, they have already demonstrated support for our bills. Thank them; state your appreciation. Other legislators sponsoring the bills are; Rep. Barney Frank, Boston, Rep. Laurence Buxbaum, Sharon, Rep. John Businger, Brookline. Various other legislators have voted for our bills in the past, and we expect them to do so again this year. As a result of "Gay Americans Day", of last Sept., and our commerce and labor committee hearing last week, on house bill No. 2524 regarding Gay Job discrimination, we have gained even more support, more interest.

An informal Rap session is being held at the State House so that legislators as well can get "More acquainted" with Gay issues.Gays are being taken more seriously now as a potent political force by the media, the State government, and judging from speaking engagements at Suburban groups, by the public in general.

Your letters of support for these bills and letters in opposition to various media coverage of Gay events or Gay related television and radio programs mean a hell of alot.

For more information about the Gay rights Bills, or Gay rights in general, contact the Student Homophile League, or call 545-0154.

Horned rimmed may mean beauty

To The Editor:

re: Mark Dlugosz's letter — "UMass Dating Dull"

According to Mark Dlugosz, the UMass girl is "one with horn-rimmed glasses, hair that she can run an electric current through, and patched jeans." Where are you looking? Try looking at your own sex and imagine how appealing they are to us girls. Long disheveled hair, flannel shirts, and ripped jeans are not highly desirable qualities. At parties, UMass guys show more interest in their joints, rather than in the girls present within the same room.

It is apparent that you based most of your letter on stereotypes. No, girls aren't here just because "it's a cheap place to go to school while they wait for their boyfriends to graduate or make a start in life." Girls are here to better their education and make their OWN start in life! What are you doing in school — that's the question.

In the future, Mark, I suggest that you remove those biased glasses that shield your eyes, and behold the many "beautiful" women on campus.

"Hopping in sack": wrong attitude

To The Editor:

Let's hear it for Mark Dlugosz's enlightened but unfortunately very rare attitude. Picking up a member of the opposite sex and "hopping in the sack" may constitute the standard procedure for meeting people at UMass, but it does little to develop a relationship. Where do we go from here? Relationships formed in bar rooms such as the Bluewall lead to the bedroom.

Perhaps what is needed is a change of attitude on both sides. Instead of plunging into relationships with the intent of exploitation, we should learn to relate to each other on a personal level. Students are so disinterested in relating to friendly strangers that few will bother to carry a conversation past an initial grunt. Most will stare back in mystified surprise that someone dared to speak to them, reeling back in shock, totally appalled.

It's about time we all crawled out of our shells and out of the sack and became aware of the importance of each other's existence. Wake up UMIES!

Nix on abortion: Kennedy agrees

To The Editor:

I received the following letter from Senator Ted Kennedy in reply to a strongly pro-abortion letter which I sent to him.

Dear Ms. Falabella:

I want to thank you for taking the time to express your views on abortion. The ruling of the Supreme Court which upheld the legality of early stage abortions has not diminished the concerns of many Americans who continue to question the moral, medical and theological aspects of this extremely complex issue.

It remains my personal feeling that once life has begun, no matter at what stage of growth, termination should not be decided merely by desire.

The Court's decision does not interfere with an individual's absolute right to follow the dictates of conscience in deciding whether to participate in an abortion. Nor does it compel others to participate against their will or create legal or professional hardship for individuals or groups who believe abortions on demand are contrary to their consciences and traditional values.

To guard against these possibilities, I attached to one of my health bills an amendment by Senator Frank Church. The amendment declares as federal policy that religious or moral beliefs of individuals, medical personnel or of hospitals, must be respected regarding the provision of abortion or sterilization sources in the health programs over which my subcommittee has legislative jurisdiction. It passed the Senate with a 94 to 0 vote and was signed into law by President Nixon on June 18, 1973. In addition I offered an amendment to the Protection of Human Subjects Act to prohibit research on any fetus prior to or subsequent to a voluntary abortion. This passed the Senate without a dissenting vote.

There are many who seek a Constitutional Amendment to overturn the Supreme Court decision. Several such amendments have been filed, and already there is dispute over which one would be most effective. Although I believe that Constitutional Amendments tend to erode the independence of the judicial branch, I feel obligated to keep an open mind on this proposal until the most effective Amendment is thoroughly examined and debated on the floor of the Senate.

I share the confidence of those who feel that America is willing to care for its wanted as well as unwanted children, protecting particularly those who cannot protect themselves. I also share the opinions of those who do not accept abortions as a response to our society's problems — an inadquate welfare system, unsatisfactory job training programs, and insufficient financial support for all its citizens.

Sincerely,
Robert M. Kennedy

Wallace: waiting in wings

I'm graduating in May, and while the prospect of going more than three consecutive months without doing scholastic exercises is enticing, I'd just as soon stay.

I've got no idea what to expect on the outside, not because of ignorance, but because the state of society is so uncertain.

I'm speculating, you're speculating, he-she-it is speculating. No one knows what's coming, everybody wonders.

I sat in the Hatch with a friend Friday, speculating, and our speculations are worth no more than TOC, or Mike's or Barsellotti's speculations. But they're undoubtedly in the same pessimistic vain.

The nation appears headed for a depression. I don't know why I think so, or he thinks so, or everyone I know thinks so, because no one in my generation has ever experienced one. But a depression appears inevitable. Ask the psychologists why.

If our dreams (?) come true, and the Republicans (you can always count on them to do it) lead us into economic disaster, who'll lead us out?

Who led us out last time? A Democrat in a wheelchair, Franklin Delano Roosevelt. And how did he get us out? (Hint: it wasn't the WPA) A war.

Now, are there any Democrats in wheelchairs around? Indeed, in the land of cotton. Alabama to be exact. And George Wallace as President is not far-fetched.

The constant deterioration of civil law and order (where have you gone, John Mitchell?), the monthly spiral of inflation, the loss of confidence in our political system, and the daily revelations of scandal in the highest offices of the Federal government are turning the nation toward reaction.

In normal times the party of reaction is the Republican, but not today. Times aren't normal and Wallace waits, a two-time loser reborn.

How's about a war? We just got over one, but the politicians didn't consider it real, so it doesn't count. We could be due.

Obviously you must look to the Middle East and open your Bible for a quick review of what Armageddon will be like. The battle won't be a simple pro-Arab, pro-Israeli affair. It's been escalated beyond that with the introduction of the oil embargoes.

Now someone has something we don't have, and as an American president couldn't bring himself to lose a war to a bunch of slant-eyed nurds, no American president will lower this great nation to the point where it will have to beg a bunch of A--rabs for oil.

When the going gets tough, it's every country for itself, and if you don't think we've reached that point or ever will then take a look at the President's latest statement concerning Europe.

Yeah, things are going to be tough. I'm going out looking for a job (my typical luck) and my friend thinks he might go back into the service.

By 1976 he'll be a major, I'll be a copy boy, and George Wallace will be President.

I can't wait.

Amendement needed

The Presidential news conference last week was a dress rehearsal of an event that may never occur. Impeachment may never occur even though President Nixon is finished as Chief Executive. It becomes more obvious every day that the Watergate Grand Jury and the House Judiciary Committee have gathered the necessary goods to incriminate him. Furthermore, it is just short of official that the invesitgation of Mr. Nixon's back taxes will yield extremely damaging evidence of tax violations and possible fraud. Wilbur Mills knows this, and so does Nixon. In short, investigators have more evidence of possible criminality on the part of the President, than at any other time in our history. The Andrew Johnson affair pales in comparison.

So, logically, that should be that, and bring on the stuffed shirt waiting in the wings. But in this most mysterious period of government, that is not that, in fact it is only the half of it. Getting the facts is one thing, but the other and more difficult task is to get Nixon to step down, either willingly or forcibly. The reason for this dilemma, is that the Constitution seemingly omits a very relevant factor in its explanation of the Impeachment process, namely the person to be impeached. It would be fairly simple if the President just sat around his office and let the House and Senate do what comes naturally. But alas, in this day and age, we have a President who is doing everything he possibly can to thwart the Impeachment process. Now whether the Founding Fathers faltered in not considering this possibility is not the issue. But the fact is that Impeachment has been subtly changed from a function justified by severe events, to an "impeach me if you can" situation.

Regarding the many clogs that the President has thrown into the investigation thus far, a larger question must loom overhead; namely, is a President guilty of obstruction of justice if he attempts to keep himself from being impeached. Now I'm not speaking of the weak-kneed attempts at news conference defenses, or shaky rationalizations of the "I know what I meant" type. I'm speaking of the more devious, behind the scenes manuveuring, arm twistings, forced resignations, and outright refusals to comply with requests from investigators. Should he be allowed to erect defenses of this type while the question of sufficient grounds for indictment is still being considered? Or should he, instead, be required to cooperate fully until such an investigation is concluded?

It is frustrating to realize, that even though there would appear to be overwhelming evidence building against Mr. Nixon, that he could block the procedure, himself, just long enough to render Impeachment ridiculous because of the time he would have left in office. He plainly does not want to face the Senate. It would be a huge blot on his Presidency, and a risk that most people feel would be suicidal to take. So his strategy must be one of preventing a House vote from being taken. So far he has succeeded on that point. This is the very area where the Constitution makes no provision for his actions. If he continues to succeed in his plan, it will result in a President talking advantage of the Constitution's lack of detail, in a manner unsurpasses in history.

If anything is learned from this disasterous period, it should be that a need exists to define in a Constitutional Amendment exactly the type of action that a President can and cannot take, in the matter of Impeachment. The strong arm of the Presidency should never be allowed to obstruct the Legislative Branch in its efforts to fulfill its obligation to the American people, as defined in the Constitution. A President's only recourse, if he does not wish to defend himself in an Impeachment proceeding, or if he fears even the preliminary investigation could be incriminating, should be resignation. Anything else, should be considered obstruction of justice, and impeachable in its own right. The Constitution should be amended to clear up this issue. Of course, it won't clear up the present situation, but I still feel it's necessary if we are to have any control over our elected officials. As far as Nixon is concerned, I still think that as the kitchen gets hotter and hotter, he'll take a powder. Let's hope so.

Justice and truth for Russ Daniels

By BOB FOSTER

There has been a story circulating the UMass campus recently; a story of the "justice" that a system such as ours dishes out to the unsuspecting, the bewildered of society. It's a sad story as all stories of aborted legality must. be It's a story of the systemic craving for efficiency, the need to convict a killer no matter what the cost. Even the price of convicting an innocent man might be paid.

It isn't a fairy tale of knights in shining armor and magic swords and damsels screaming from castle dungeons. Instead, it is a lonely voice from the depths of Walpole, a horror tale of horror tales, a story of supposed crime and punishment, supposed due process, supposed defendant's rights. It is the story of Russ Daniels.

I first came upon it in a reprint from the "Real Paper". Joe Klein of that paper published the story of Russ. One reads it and wonders why the system works as it does; what evil intent lies within the machinations of justice? Yet, the only answers that one can come up with are the same answers one gets when one questions nuclear armament or capital punishment. Those answers are, "We must, for it is in our nature, we must!" Thus, we trace a circular path back to the point from which we began. We get nowhere. The lumbering automaton of justice rolls over all in its path. It is a juggernaut of fear and punishment, not truth and justice.

Thus is the case of Mr. Daniels. Born not quite as mentally dexterous as you or I, he found himself in the infamous Belchertown State School. He liked it there. He was a worker that most employers only dream about, conscientious to the point of overconscientiousness. Everybody at Belchertown loved Russ. Russ' feelings were naturally mutual. But policies change, the system grinds on. And thus it was decided that Russ must face the world. Belchertown became a happy memory and life a drastic reality.

After several months in a halfway house, Russ began work and life in a world quite different from Belchertown, the world you and I take for granted. In his usual hard working way, he flowered in a position as janitor in a Springfield apartment house. Yet perhaps, that was to be his downfall. He was Black and cooperative as a sedated puppy; two strikes against him from the beginning in our system. He would do anything to please, anything to receive the much needed support and reinforcement. Thus, when the police arrested him for the murder of a deaf lady in his apartment building, he cooperated. And when he was questionned without the presence of an attorney for so many hours, he cooperated. He was just plain scared by the men in blue, so he cooperated. The cooperation led to a confession and the confession to trial and the trial to conviction and conviction to sentencing and sentencing to Walpole. It was a neat little package with justice stamped in bold red letters across the top. It was the juggernaut at work grinding another helpless victim beneath its wheels.

We find "justice" and "truth" as the ultimate ideals of our system, yet efficiency and conviction as the hard-pressed realities. Read the story of Russ Daniels in the "Real Paper". And then ask yourself, "What would happen if I was in that situation? Would I too be a victim of the mindless juggernaut of justice?" I pray to God that the same story never has to be written again.

For the people

Who is Russell Daniels ...and why?

By MARK VOGLER

A group of University of Massachusetts students have begun to rally around a convicted murderer who may very well rot to death at Norfolk Prison.

Who is Russell W. Daniels and why had he suddenly emerged a symbol of another student cause?

He certainly does not possess the human magnetism which made Dr. Benjamin Spock and Angella Davis ideological prisoners of their times. Hardly.

Russell Daniels is quite insignificant as far as the rest of society is concerned. The fact of whether he is guilty or innocent is also insignificant.

And Russell Daniels, unlike the case of Spock and Davis, is unconscious of his own cause--he is totally unaware of his mounting student following.

But what is very significant is that Russell Daniels is both mentally retarded and black--a very incriminating end in itself.

The struggle of the American black has existed since this country's birth. Despite the extensive racism which still rips this nation, some progress has been made.

The struggle of the mentally retarded in this country has experienced little if any success. Progress has been nill.

So what...

"So the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has distinguished itself by sending to prison a 9-year-old boy (in a 28-year-old body) who suffers the dual discrimination of being both black and mentally retarded," says Dr. Benjamin Ricci, president of the Belchertown State School Friends Association.

Ricci has appealed to Governor Sargent and his administration for an investigation into Daniel's case for over a year. So far there has been no response.

Now students have begun to take issue. Is it just another campus craze which will die out before it ever gets started?

Most of the students involved in the Daniels campaign say no. The group, under the advice of former state Corrections Commissioner John Boone, has decided only to cite Daniels as a case example.

"According to Mr. Boone, five to ten percent of Massachusetts' prison population is incarcerated under much the same circumstances--and should be treated as mentally retarded," says Susan Sherry, a coordinator of the group.

There remains some doubt as to whether Daniels actually did commit the murder he was convicted of. The strongest evidence surmounted against him was a statement of confession which he testified he signed by police pressure. Daniels indicated to the court that he had the reading ability of a second grader--insufficient to comprehend the contents of the statement.

But guilty or innocent, the question of whether a prison is the fitting place for a mentally retarded person is what is at stake. Is this cruel and inhumane treatment?

Carroll Sheehan

by MARK VOGLER

Is Carroll Sheehan for real?

For the record he was a former state commerce commissioner from 1969 to 1971 under Gov. Francis W. Sargent. And now he wants to be Governor -- and he's taking his candidacy quite seriously.

But just how seriously Gov. Sargent and the state electorate take Sheehan remains to be seen. Facts speak for themselves.

Sheehan is critical of the Sargent administration for its mishandling of the economy -- and will use this in the September GOP primary as the framework of his platform.

He contends "a hostile economic climate," --thanks to the Sargent administration--has hindered employment in Massachusetts and his virtually driven commerce from the state.

Sargent's lack of concern to the business community seriously handcuffed him from carrying out his duties and later forced him to resign, the new candidate says.

Sheehan's candidacy seems to hold few answers for the business state of affairs in Massachusetts and resembles more the anti-Sargent ramblings of sorts.

He points the finger at the Sargent administration for the state's economic nosedive from 1969-71.

--According to the Division of Employment Security, the average state unemployment rate rose from 3.9 to 7.0 percent during that time.

Obviously Sheehan has some interesting data of sorts to back his assault on Sargent.

--Between 1969 and 1970, the state lost 35,000 manufacturing jobs.

--Between 1970 and 1971, 48,100 manufacturing jobs were lost.

But Sheehan's resignation was followed by a rapid turnabout. Between 1971 and 1972, only 600 jobs were lost. During the following year the state enjoyed a gain of 19,100 jobs in manufacturing.

If this is Sheehan's basic platform, then he may be in serious trouble.

The Governor, at this point, has nothing to fear but a wave of unsubstantiated allegations accompanied with no solutions.

And just being a Republican in this election, Sheehan cannot afford to run on a fellow GOP's shortcomings. And just being a Republican, it would seem that Carroll Sheehan must come up with some legitimate substance before he can make his candidacy both solid and serious. Otherwise he's just a paper tiger.

Shield laws... they're dead

By BOB MACKAY

Controversial shield laws for Mass. newspaper and broadcast reporters apparently will not pass this year. Division withint the ranks of newsmen has doomed chances of passage.

The Mass. Newspaper Publisher's Ass'n. announced Thurs. that it has reversed itself and now opposes shield laws. The Ass'n. represents most of the state's daily newspapers.

Meanwhile, the N. E. Press Ass'n., representing weekly newspapers, and the Mass. Broadcaster's Ass'n. told the Legislature's Judiciary Committee that they support legislation for newsmen seeking to protect the privacy of their sources of information.

The Committee on the Judiciary was hearing testimony on several bills which would prevent state prosecutors from focing reporters to divulge information except in extreme cases.

The two leading shield law proposals were filed by Attorney General Robert H. Quinn and Senator John M. Quinlan (R-Norwood).

Sen. Quinlan's office explained to this reporter the context of the Senator's bill. The law would be inoperative when it could be proven that information or sources of information was needed to --

- prosecute in the case of a felony

- guard a life that had been threatened

-- AND the information as not available anywhere else.

Several legislators at the hearing opposed the shield law bills after attacking various local newspapers which they said had slandered them.

Rep. William Saltzman (I-New Bedford) was one of those who testified against shield laws. Saltzman explained that he believed some newspapers were, in reporting news, partisan towards those whom they knew.

The New Bedford legislator urged approval of bills which would require all newspaper editorials to be signed. Saltzman and others, including Rep. William F. Hogan (D-Everett), also sponsored bills which would require publications to provide free space to officials and political candidates who had been "assailed" or "defaced."

The newspaper associations opposed these regulatory bills.

Cont. Ed. offers law for non-lawyers

By ROB RANSBOTTOM
MDC Staff

Law for non-lawyers is a new 6 week seminar offered by Continuing Education during their new "open semester."

The deadline for registering is this Wednesday, March 20, in Hills North. The class meets on Wednesday evening, costing $22 including materials, and is non-credit.

The teacher is Eric Walgren, a long-standing political and cultural activist in the valley, who is a newcomer to University teaching. He is a graduate of Amherst College, who then earned a Doctor of Law at Rutgers University, and is presently a subsistence farmer.

The course description reads like this: "The true nature of the legal process is revealed thru these topics: 'Thinking like a lawyer;' 'Finding out the law' (legal research); Civil law: contracts of all sorts (including leases, loans, guarantees and marriage); the democratic process (in myth and reality); The various powers of government (war, tax, etc.); Criminal law: rights of the accused and the spectrum of crimes (just and unjust); and Court procedures. Six weekly 2 hour sessions: lecture (for tools) and discussion (for practice), also one lab in the law library. Short reading of xeroxed materials. Teaches you to practice some law and follow the rest."

Although not a member of the bar, Eric has pushed the law further in the area of social change than any other local practitioner. His claim to fame is securing a U.S. Court of Appeals opinion that a college town must hold its election during regular class session lest officials discriminate the student right to vote.

Amherst College is his next big target.

JOHN ASHBERRY

Amherst poetry reading

A four-night poetry festival, featuring poets reading from their own works, will be held at 8 p.m. Monday, March 18 through Thursday, March 21 at Amherst College. The events of the festival are open to the public without charge.

The participating poets are John Ashbery, Charles Wright, C.K. Williams, and Charles Simic. Ashbery will read from his own work on Monday, March 18 in the Alumni House; Wright will be featured on Tuesday, March 19 in the Alumni House; Williams on Wednesday, March 20 in Johnson Chapel; and Simic on Thursday, March 21 in Johnson Chapel.

The author of over a dozen volumes of poetry, Ashbery has also written plays, novels, translations, and art and literary criticism. A highly-esteened poet, he received the Shelley Award in 1973 from the Petry Society of America and the National Institute of Arts and Letters award in 1969. His poetry volumes include "Rivers and Mountains," "Sunrise in Suburbia," "The Double Dream of Spring," and "Three Poems." His pems have been included in dozens of anthologies.

The "New York Times Review of Books" cited Wright's "command of impeccable phrasing and finely detailed imagery" in a revew of his most recent volume of poems, "Hard Freight." Before "Hard Freight," he published a volume of poems entitled "The Grave of the Right Hand."

The author of "Lies," "A Day for Anne Frank," and other books, Williams has worked as a free-lance editor, mostly for psychiatric publications, since 1965. In 1962 he set up and conducted a program of poetry-therapy at the Institute of the Pennsylvania Hospital. He has been included in poetry anthologies ranging from "The Major Young Poets" to "Naked Poetry II."

Busted Umies

Five UMass students arrested last month by Amherst police for growing marijuana were found guilty Friday in Northampton District Court. Sentencing was postponed until March 29.

On Feb. 26, police raided their home at 97 Belchertown Rd. and found 27 marijuana plants growing under artificial light in the cellar.

The students are William H. Lavigne, 20, of Pittsfield; Michael J. Marjin, 22, of Quincy; Neil P. Benjamin, 20, of Pittsfield; John L. Brooks, 26, of Boston and Paul R. Johansen, 19, of Attleboro.

Police arrested the group after a complaint from a neighbor, according to spokesmen at the time of the arrest.

Speed read

An eight session Speed Reading and Study Skill course will be offered to all students through the Southwest Colloquium Series, beginning the week after vacation. Designed to give students practice in the mechanics of speed and the techniques of study, the course will attempt to teach retention of material through critical reading. Basic skill of outlining and word analysis will also be instructed. Time to be arranged. Contact Jackie Bonomo, 6-9983, mornings.

TRIBAL ANNOUNCER — This face, part of a statue-drum device beaten to emphasize important words being said by orators in tribal ceremonies, is among objects now on display in an "Art of the Sepik River" exhibit.

Prehistoric art at Amherst

"The Art of the Sepik River" is the title of the current exhibit on display through April 7, at Amherst College's Pratt Museum. The exhibit, part of a series showing various aspects of prehistoric and ethnographic art, is open to the public without charge.

"The Art of the Sepik River, New Guinea, is inventive, dynamic, and intensely compelling," explains Amherst College Curator of Anthropology David C. Yates. "This art deserves to be appreciated not only for its innate aesthetic value, but to be understood as the spiritual expressions of life-ways which are vanishing with alarming finality."

The Sepik River basin is sparsely populated by some 260,000 people. The river itself serves as the single most important unifying element over the ecologically diverse 28,000 square miles of river basin, allowing social and cultural intercommunication between the various tribal people along its 700-mile length.

Over the course of ten months spent along the Sepik River, Richard and Patricia Button collected the objects in this exhibit. During their expedition of the area, they traveled along the 700 mile length of the river to its source, visiting many remote villages in the Central Highlands, the inhabitants of which had never seen a European. Since returning to the U.S., they have supplied many museums of art and natural history with items of ethnographic interest.

Visitors to the College's museum should enter the campus on the South Pleasant Street (Route 116) entrance, a half-block south of the intersection of Route 9 and Route 116 in the center of Amherst. By following the one-way road around the "Quad," visitors will find the museum between the Merrill Center and the Amherst War Memorial. Hours to visit Pratt Museum are 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Monday through Saturday. Closed Sunday.

We
you.

Our Officer Selection Officers are looking for a few good college men—maybe 3 out of 100—who will make good Marine officers. If you're one of them, we'll give you a chance to prove it during summer training at Quantico, Virginia.

Our program is Platoon Leaders Class, PLC. With ground, air and law options. You might even qualify for up to $2,700 to help you through college. But if money is all you're looking for, don't waste your time.

The challenge is leadership. If you want it, work for it. If you've got it, show us. It's one hell of a challenge. But we're looking for one hell of a man.

The Stop & Shop Companies
Commitment to the Consumer

We've made a science of meat handling in the store!
For some time now, we've been telling our customers about Stop & Shop's revolutionary Marlboro Meat Plant which enables us to maintain uniform cleanliness and tight quality control, allowing our beef to age carefully and naturally. This prompts some of my customers to ask me, "Can I be assured that these same high standards are maintained in the meat room in your store?"
The answer is an absolute "Yes!" Every Stop & Shop meat department is operating under the healthiest environmental and sanitary standards that meat has ever had in a supermarket. Our meat backrooms are kept at 45° ... and at 32° to 34° in our refrigerator. These are the ideal temperatures for keeping meat fresh. It's controlled by our meat managers who've received extensive training in all aspects of meat handling, including sanitation and refrigeration standards, and this becomes part of their daily routine.
All equipment in the meat department was especially designed with sanitation in mind. For instance, we have eliminated the wooden chopping blocks which can encourage bacteria growth. They have been replaced by stainless steel and plastic cutting boards, non-porous for easy washing. In addition, we use high pressure hot water sprayers to sanitize our equipment, and display cases.
This all goes to show, there's more to Quality Protected Beef than meets the eye!

New computer ordered here

After a year and a half of study, the UMass Computing Center has ordered a $3.79 million computer from Control Data Corp. with a capacity five times greater than any other computer on campus.

The new computer-a Cyber 74-eventually will replace two computers now in use and will offer much "higher speed and precision" to researchers, according to Conrad Wogrin, director of the Computing Center. The machine is slated to be installed in the Graduate Research Center next August.

The cost to the campus to lease the machine will be $50,000 a month or $2.1 million over the following three and a half years, according to the terms of the contract signed March 1. During the time, officials will evaluate the computer's performance and decide whether to extend the lease. It is common practice for institutions to lease rather than puchase computers, Wogrin said, adding that a lease requires a short-term commitment.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

I feel the communications barrier between humans and animals is very thin and is going to be shattered. Neptune in Sagittarius, among other things, will coincide with man's ability to comprehend the language of other species.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Select quality. Leave shortcuts, get-rich-quick schemes to others. If you depend on partners or others, you could be disappointed. What appeared to be a firm agreement may actually lack substance. Know it and prepare accordingly.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Older person, who has had travel experience, will share knowledge. Key is to make inquiries. Toss aside false pride. You will establish valuable relationship by stating your needs in frank, mature manner.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Publicize products. Get better distribution arrangement. Reach toward potential. Refuse to be painted into corner. You have right to enlarge horizons. Those who object are either stupid or envious, or a combination. Request an accounting.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): New methods are called for — don't feel you are wedded to past. You can break through despite delays, red tape. Know it; act accordingly. Leo, Aquarius individuals could figure prominently. Questions regarding partnership, joint efforts, marriage could arise.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): One concerned with security may seem to be a busybody, impertinent. However, you need counseling and, like it or not, you probably will get it. You find out something saving as well as earning. Your basic attitude toward money might undergo transformation.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Reach beyond what appears to be a limitation. You might surprise yourself. You are capable of more than you have been showing, of late. Sagittarius, Gemini persons might figure prominently. Be ready for significant change — and chance to utilize creative talents.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): You may have to tear down for purpose of rebuilding. What appears to be a contradiction will fall into place. Your own uniqueness becomes valuable asset. Don't water down principles. You are on right track, despite possible objections by the mediocre.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Movement, change, a feeling of being alive — these areas are spotlighted. You learn where you stand with regard to special relationship. Gemini, Virgo persons could be in picture. Short trip proves fruitful.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Purchase of luxury item is considered — or questioned. Budget is involved. Surprise for family member should take precedence. Follow through on best instincts. Means adhere to principles of golden rule.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Cycle is high but you have tendency to see what you want to see. Before putting up cash, ask to see books. Then perceive situation as it actually exists. Pisces, Virgo persons might play prominent roles. Career, ambitions, prestige — these get a boost.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): What appears elusive may not actually be worth pursuing. Revise estimates. Get sense of value in proper perspective. Don't feel that only past is real. Future beckons and is brighter than you might imagine.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Study Aquarius message for valid hint. Finish rather than begin — strive now to unify, organize and present product — and self — in best possible light. Aries, Libra persons figure prominently. Look behind scenes for answers.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you are interested in law, theater and medicine. You are more sensitive to drugs than the average person. November will be one of your most important months of 1974. You are sensitive, dynamic and can display a raging temper. You also will fight for the underdog.

James Montgomery Band returns

By SCOTT BACHERMAN
MDC Staff

The James Montgomery Band, formerly the James Montgomery Blues Band, returned to UMass last Thursday night after a years absence, and played two shows before an obedient crowd in the Campus Center Auditorium.

Last week's performance in the Student Union Ballroom was nearly a carbon copy of last year's show. Come to think of it, there is little variation in any of Montgomery's concerts. As usual, people had the opportunity to shake off their emotions. The cost for shakin' was the biggest difference between this years show. It was $2.50 per ticket ($2.00 in advance.; Last year it was a buck.

Montgomery himself continued to prove why the band is called the James Montgomery Band. His voice, harp playing, and basic stage manner command the attention of the audience with relative ease. He had the disadvantage of trying to project in an acoustically poor hall, however. Although his vocals were unclear anddry in spots, Montgomery was able to capture the crowd with "That's All Right," a twelve minute slow blues number which seems like a good bet for the band's next Capricorn release.

The band is far away from the national prominance that was expected long ago. Poor promotion in Detroit, Montgomery's home town, led to poor album sales of their first release, 'First Time Out.' The album was followed by an unsuccessful national tour as a back-up band to Edgar Winter, The Steve Miloler Band, and Black Oak Arkansas.

The album sold well in Boston as expected, but also proved why the band is a "live" band. They had a great amount of difficulty in recording "Train", which was intended to be the strongest cut on the album. The pressure to perform the song well in the studio was obviously too great, and ended in an unbalanced disaster.

It's an unwritten rule that musicians put out a studio album before a live disc. In James' case this was unfortunate. Their second album will most likely be live, and should be a big improvement, since crowd reaction plays a large part in the bands output.

HOW DO YOU THINK MOST PEOPLE YOUR AGE DIE?

It's not drugs.
It's not suicide.
And it's not cancer.
It's automobile crashes.
More American people between the ages of 15 and 25 die in automobile crashes than in any other way.
At least half of those deaths are alcohol related. And the drunk drivers who cause most of them are under 25. Sometimes, many times, they kill themselves.
One of the most dangerous things you can do is get drunk and drive home.
You can change it. You have to.
You march against the war. You fight for clean air and clean water. You eat natural foods. You practice yoga. You are so much for life. And you are so much against killing.
It would be unthinkable for you to wittingly kill another human being.
So then, why is this happening?

Bruins batter Rangers, 5-2 in playoff style game

By PHIL CANNADAY
Associated Press Writer

BOSTON (AP) - Both Phil Esposito and coacc Bep Guidolin of the Boston Bruins are thinking about the upcoming Stanley Cup Playoffs.

"It was a tough game," Esposito said Sunday after scoring two goals, his 64th and 65th of the year, to pace the Bruins past the New York Rangers 5-2. "That's the playoff brand of hockey."

The Bruins have been playing a more deliberate style of hockey the last few games, concentrating more on checking and controlling the puck.

"That's what you have to do to win games," Espositio said. "For us to be successful, our lines have to forecheck. When you keep them on their guard, it's better for you."

Guidolin said he's working to keep his team sharp, despite a good lead over Montreal in the National Hockey League East Division.

"We're playing the good clubs now," he said. "I'm glad it's that way. It keeps you playing good hockey."

Emile "Cat" Francis, coach of the Rangers, aid the crucial goal was Terry O'Reilly's in the first period, pulling the Bruins to a 1-1 tie with the Rangers. The goal was protested by the Rangers who said O'Reilly kicked the goal in with his skate.

"If you go into the second ahead 1-0, they've got to come to you," Francis said. "That goal changed things around. It shouldn't have been a goal. He kicked it in."

Ken Hodge and Don Marcotte also scored for Boston.

It was Esposito's 10th goal in his last seven games and the 19th in those seven games for the Esposito-Hodge-Wayne Cashman line as the East Division-leading Bruins trimmed their magic number to six points over the New York Rangers and five over the Montreal Canadiens.

PHIL ESPOSITO
"It was a tough game."

The Bruins spotted New York a first period goal by Brad Park, who broke with Steve Vickers two-on-one on Bobby Orr. Vickers passed to Park for the clear shot on Boston goalie Gilles Gilbert.

Terry O'Reilly tied it up with four seconds remaining in the period when Don Marcotte's rebound went in off his skate.

The second period belonged to the Esposito line as it collected two goals, the 44th since they were reunited as a line Feb. 2. Esposito tallied number 64 on a power play, taking a pass from Cashman in front of the New York net and banging it past goalie Ed Giacomin.

Hodge scored moments later, jamming the puck between Giacomin's skate and the goal post while the Bruins trio had set up camp in front of the Ranger's net.

Marcotte poked in O'Reilly's rebound for the fouuth goal in the third period and Vickers matched it for New York taking a llad pass from Bobby Rousseau and going in alone on Gilbert.

Esposito scored his second goal of the game into an empty net at 19:59 of the final session.

Hose split NL duet

Beat Phils, fall to Cards

By DAVE O'HARA
AP Sports Writer

WINTER HAVEN, Fla. (AP) — The Boston Red Sox broke even in off-season trades with St. Louis as they split an exhibition doubleheader 25 miles apart Sunday, beating the Philadelphia Phillies 10-7 at Clearwater but losing to the Cardinals 4-3 at St. Petersburg.

Former Card Rick Wise allowed just one hit and Bernie Carbo, also acquired last winter from St. Louis, had four hits and drive in three runs against Philadelphia.

However, at St. Petersburg the Cardinals turned on a former teammate and got big help from three ex-Red Sox players in handing Boston its second defeat in 11 Grapefruit League starts.

Mike Garman checked the Red Sox for three innings on one hit and Ken Tatum breezed through the ninth. Then former Boston slugger Reggie Smith tied the score 3-3 and the Cards quickly pushed the winning run across on a two-base throwing error by Mario Guerrero, who had entered the game as a defensive replacement.

Smith's homer, a mighty blast against a stiff wind, and the deciding run were scored against veteran reliever Diego Segui, who came to Boston in one of the two off-season deals.

Carl Yastrzemski drove in all three Boston runs with a basesloaded double off Bob Gibson.

Southpaw Bill Lee became the first Red Sox pitcher to go six innings this spring. Lee allowed five hits, but both runs scored against him were unearned because of an error by shortstop Rick Burleson.

At Clearwater, young outfielder Jim Rice drove in five runs with two singles and a long homer for the Red Sox. Dick McAuliffe drove in Boston's two other runs.

Fisk vs. Smith - again

By WILL GRIMSLEY
Ap Special Correspondent

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. (AP) - Reggie Smith callld Carlton Fisk a "crybaby" and a "back-stabber" Sunday and fanned the flames of the simmering feud between the two former Boston Red Sox teammates.

"I'm glad to get away from a crybaby like Fisk," said Smith, standing at the batting cage at Al Lang Field, proudly wearing the emblem of the St. Louis Cardinals across his chest.

The Cards were playing host to the Red Sox in an exhibition baseball game and it marked the first confrontation between outfielder Smith and catcher Fisk since their bitter barbs last winter, after Smith had been traded to the Cards in a four-player deal.

Smith and Fisk kept at a discreet distance during the warmups. in the first inning, Smith came to bat with Fisk behind the plate for Boston. They exchanged only cold stares - no words. Smith took a called third strike on a called pitch by Bill Lee.

Before the game, Smith, who batted .303 and hit 21 home runs for the Red Sox last season, said he had not seen Fisk since the 1973 campaign.

"I've only seen his picture in the paper and read all that stuff he's beensaying behind my back," Smith said. "He didn't have the nerve to say it to my face. He had the chance. We were called into the manager's office together."

There has been a long-time personality clash between Fisk and Smith.

BILL WALTON, left, and KEITH WILKES, right, named recently to the AP all-America team, propelled UCLA to the NCAA finals semifinals on Saturday.

In NCAA finals at Greensboro...

Marquette, Kansas, North Carolina St. try to take UCLA

"Nobody in the national finals compares to UCLA."

They'll all get a chance to see if San Francisco Coach Bob Gaillard is right.

The ultra-successful Bruins rocketed into the championship round of the NCAA basketball playoffs by beating Gaillard's Dons 83-60 Saturday in the West regional finals.

UCLA earned a berth opposite North Carolina State, which won the East regionals with a rebounding 100-72 victory over Pittsburgh.

Marquette and Kansas complete the Big Four picture at Greensboro, N.C. Colorful Marquette defeated Michigan 72-70 in the Mideast finals and unheralded Kansas stopped Oral Roberts 93-90 in overtime in the Midwest.

Winners of the semifinals will play for the national championship the following Monday night, March 25.

Keith Wilkes' 27 points led UCLA's smoothies into their eighth straight appearance in the championship round. The Bruins have won seven straight national titles and nine in the last 10 years.

How well the Bruins fare against North Carolina State may hinge on David Thompson's condition. The Wolfpack's star forward suffered a head injury midway in the first half of Saturday's game and received 15 stitches.

Apparently motivated by his teammate's accident, a grim Tom Burleson scored 21 of his 26 points after the incident to lead the Wolfpack.

Dave Delsman's two free throws with 45 seconds remaining gave Marquette a tense victory over Michigan, the Big Ten Conference's representative.

The victory ended years of frustration for the Warriors, an animated, defensive team with gaudy, sky-blue uniforms to match their passionate style of play.

Team unity key in gym win

finals on Saturday, but most important was what their first routines had done by setting a strong hard pace for Springfield. The event score was a substantial 26.65.

Meanwhile Springfield, on floor had some nice clean routines, but earned only a 25.45 to put them 1.2 points behind. Their top three scores for the event were Debbie Dunkley's 8.86, Kim Andres' 8.45 and Katherine Kolemainen's 8.4, all qualifying for the finals. These women are three of Springfield's five strong All Arounders, displaying the depth this team has to work with. The other two All Arounders, Debbie Mezger and Stephanie Jones also qualified for floor finals.

The second rotation put Springfield on vaulting and UMass on beam. This was the highlight event, and as it progressed, an observer would never have guessed UMass had been plagued with problems on the beam. All six routines can only be described in one word-solid. Marian Kulick set the pace, with only one fall in an otherwise smooth routine, for a 7.55. The next four routines got progressively stronger with Margie Combs' 8.25, Heidi Armstrong's 8.3, Jodi Hitt's 8.7 and Jeannine Burger's 9.0. Finishing the event was Anne Vexler, who had one fall in an otherwise superb routine, to give her an 8.55. The total was an unbelievable 26.25 and one of the best displays of UMass' team unity. Of their six competitors, the last five qualified for finals, dominating the event.

Springfield's vaulting gained them some ground as they totalled 26.5 with scores of 9.0 from Kim Andres and 8.75 each from Stephanie Jones and Katherine Kolemainen. Only Andres qualified for finals.

After two events UMass led with 52.90, less than a point ahead of Springfield's 51.90.

As compared to past performances, floor exercise was perhaps not as strong a UMass team showing as expected, although the 26.35 score is nothing to be disappointed about. The first three competitors were Marian Kulick (7.35), Alicia Goode (7.9) and Jodi Hitt (7.85). UMass' three all arounders followed with strong routines all qualifying for finals. Margie Combs performed her way to an 8.45. Jeannine Burger, having one of her best overall nights, earned a 9.1. Anne Vexler, entertaining the crowd with her unique dance, received an 8.8, having a slight problem with her full twisting back somie.

Springfield was on bars at this point, displaying some strong smooth routines. Yet they couldn't break into the nines and though the event score came to a respectable 26.0, it put them, once again, more than one point behind UMass. Their top three scores qualified for finals led by a tie between freshman Stephanie Jones and Debbie Dunkley at 8.85 and followed by Kim Andres' 8.3.

The last rotation put the lid on the meet for UMass. Springfield, already behind, and perhaps the most psychologically destroying event on which to try to pull ahead, balance beam. UMass was finishing with their strongest event, vaulting, a definite advantage. Yet the meet was not determined by this one event, but a sum total of all four.

UMass totalled their highest event score on vaulting with a 26.95. Every score was at least in the upper eights. Heidi Armstrong, first competitor in the line-up scored an amazing 8.85, followed by Anne Vexler's 8.9. Marian Kulick earned an 8.6 after which Linda Nelligan vaulted her way to an 8.8. Margie Combs was awarded the highest score of the meet with a 9.2, rounding out a fine all around performance. Jeannine Burger scored an 8.65, her low event for the evening. The four top vaulters qualified for the finals.

When Springfield got off the beam they had totalled their lowest event score for the meet, 25.15 and had surrendered their long standing Eastern Champion title. Their top three beam scorers did qualify for finals with Kim Andres' 8.5, Debbie Dunkley's 8.4 and Stephanie Jones' 8.2. But it seemed as if UMass and Springfield had switched places on beam, with the SC women having the unfortunate breaks and falls once plaguing the UMass team.

UMass now prepares to defend its other title as National Champions in Sacramento, California in three weeks. And if the women remain as united in their team effort as they were on Friday, it seems unlikely that anyone can overcome UMass' Minutewomen.

IT WAS AN EMOTIONAL TWO DAYS for Jeannine Burger, shown with her uneven bars, floor-ex and all-around trophies. Her mother looks on.

Super crowd and super psych pushed women to height

By WALT POWERS

Marion Kulick stood in the dusty din of the Cage near the end of the Eastern women's gymnastics championships and her eyes filled with tears. Someone had just told her the unofficial score, but her elation was just the initial sprinkling of the deluge that was to come.

When the announcer blurted over the loudspeaker moments later that UMass had won the Eastern title, their first ever, the crowd erupted from their seats as the UMass bench dissolved into a mass of laughing, sobbing embracing young women caught up in the shared ecstasy of one of the greatest moments in their athletic lives. Meanwhile the Springfield team, which had become quiet and somber as the meet progress, walked over as a unit to congratulate the team that had divested them of a title they had held since it's inception.

This was sports at it's best.

The first thing a writer does after a meet of this significance is look for reasons. Reasons why UMass, who had beaten Springfield only once before, led the Chiefs from the start and were never seriously challenged after the first two events. Reasons why the perennial Eastern champions had faltered on the same event that had pushed them to a dual-meet victory over UMass just a few weeks earlier. Reasons why the defending national champs turned an event that had been their achilles heel into a knock out weapon that propelled them to their highest score of the season and their first eastern title ever.

Assistant coach Mike Kasavanna offered a few tangible answers.

"I think the order of events helped us," he said. "We had never competed in that order (unevens, beam, floor, and vaulting) before, but we practised very hard during the week in that order, and were prepared.

The random drawing had made balance beam the second event for UMass and the final event for Springfield. Perhaps the most difficult event on the women's program, it put the Chiefs in an automatic "must hit" situation while at the same time taking the pressure off the UMass women. When UMass turned in by far it's best beam score of the season, Springfield was placed in a do or die position on the event with the lowest survival rate. Not even the judges could have saved them here.

The fact that UMass performed alone on each event before big home crowd didn't hurt UMass either, according to Kasavanna.

On paper, these reasons make sense, but they don't explain the playful, exciting vitality that radiated like sparks from Anne Vexler, the giddy, bubbling euphoria that was all-around champ Jeannine Burger, or the relaxed, confident exhileration that cemented the whole team like a glue. This was the dominating force behind the womens success, and Springfield and the twenty other also-rans were helpless against it.

The turning point had come early-on the first event. That was the uneven parallel bars and UMass won it with explosive ease. At that point an upset looked good. Then on the balance beam, Jeannine Berger, Jodi Hitt, and "Miss Vex" made it inevitable.

I never doubted that we'd win", said a euphoric Jeannine Burger. "Everybody was ready, and we tried so hard during the week. Then we went out hard on those first two events and I knew we were going to win". Was beating Springfield or winning the Easterns the bigger thrill?

"Beating Springfield was good," she said, "But I like to think about it positively, so winning the Easterns was better".

Then there was the crowd. With a few exceptions it had, until the final time slot, remained a conglomeration of independent gymnastics spectators. When UMass hit the balance beam, however, an act of magic seemed to transform it into a single organism. Focused on the most dramatic event of the meet, it hushed, gasped and applauded in almost perfect unison. It was friendly, receptive, and appreciative, and Anne Vexler loved it.

"The crowd," she said in an indirect reference to the hostile crowd at the UMass-Springfield dual-meet, "was the big difference. Performing before a big enthusiastic home crowd really psyched us up." Like everyone else "Vex" saw the balance beam as the meet's turning point.

"We were pretty confident and relaxed during this meet," she said. "After the beam, we knew it was downhill".

UMass fans were ecstatic when UMass tied the game at the end, but their joy was brief.

UMass falls short, 73-69

By STEVE DECOSTA

The door was open, but the Minutemen didn't even bother to knock.

The tourney favorite, North Carolina, had lost earlier in the day, leaving the NIT crown up for grabs. Screaming UMies controlled one-third of Madison Square Garden, and the noise reached a deafening crescendo seldom heard outside of the Cage. The Minutemen hit on five of their first six shots from the floor to take an early 11-6 lead, and how could that rag-tag, shoot-em-up, mayhem type of team from Jacksonville ever hope to remain on the same court with a well-patterned basketball machine from Massachusetts?

To the surprise of almost everyone present, the Dolphins rebounded from their early game abundance of turnovers and geveral ineptitude to outplay the Minutemen in their own fortes, defense, shooting percentage, and rebounding, and parlayed their superiority into a 73-69 overtime victory in the opening round of the NIT.

Jacksonville caught up to the Minutemen with 13:42 left in the first half, and they never trailed after that.

In fact, the game had no business going into overtime. Jacksonville, holding a two-point lead with four minutes to play, settled back into a slow-down, wait-for-the-good-shot offensive pattern that resulted in two easy lay-ups that somehow were missed by Jimmy Clarke and Henry Williams. That set the stage for a 15 foot jumper off the hands of Peter Trow with 40 seconds remaining, to tie the score at 67.

Even though they had trailed most of the way, the Minutemen should have had the advantage in the extra period. That invisible enigma of momentum had swung their way and the Dolphins, after four minutes of stalling, would have to regain their timing and begin to play end-to-end basketball once again.

But the story of the overtime was a capsule summary of the frustrations of the evening as a whole. Time and again the Minutemen held the upper hand but failed to capitalize on Jacksonville mistakes. In fact, UMass could manage only a single hoop in the final five minutes.

There was a lesson to be learned through the night's frustrations: you can't play big-time basketball without a super center who can jump through the roof.

That's no knock on John Murphy, who led all scorers with 25 points, but most of his hoops came on outside, fallaway jumpers that kept him out of rebounding position. Though he managed to hold Jacksonville's 6'10 center, Butch Taylor, to six caroms (he had been averaging close to thirteen) by drawing him away from the basket, the other Minutemen just couldn't compete with the taller, more physical Dolphins under the boards.

On the other end of the court, Taylor's sweeping hooks and spinning lay-ups were just too much for the shorter and slower Murphy to handle.

Throughout the year, the Minutemen had prided themselves on their balanced team attack, but even that fell apart under the Dolphin pressure. It can be boasted that four Minutemen reached double figures, but the misleading fact of the matter is that they were the only four to score at all.

Peter Trow put on the best shooting show of the night as he hit on eight of twelve field goal attempts, including an incredible baseline underhand scoop from behind the glass, to finish with 16 points.

Murphy, as mentioned, hit for 25, but the only other Minutemen to split the twine were Al Skinner with 15 and Bill Endicott with 13.

As a team, the Minutemen could hit on only 43 per cent of their shots, their worst performance in a season that had seen them average over 51 per cent. The shooting was hampered by a switching Dolphin defense that prevented the UMass from their normal penetration.

In comparison, Jacksonville shot 54 per cent from the floor, a mark that was inflated by an almost incredible amount of lay-ups and offensive rebounds.

The Dolphins also featured a balanced scoring attack led by Taylor with 21 points. Henry Williams poured in 14. Leon Benbow shipped in with 12, and Carlos Bermudez and Jimmy Clarke each hit on five of six shots to collect 11 and 10 points, respectively.

Jacksonville turned the ball over 24 times, a surprisingly high number for a winning team, but the Minutemen managed to give it up an almost equally unhealthy 18 times of their own.

IN DESPERATION Bill Endicott drives past Jacksonville's Shawn Leftwich successfully, but overall, penetration by the Minutemen was poor.

In a way, the UMass turnovers were more costly than those of their counterparts. On at least a half dozen occasions, the Minutemen forced a JU giveaway, and, in their anxiety to capitalize, gave the ball right back.

But it was the little things that hurt the Minutemen the most. Their overall execution was poor, with mistakes that one might expect in a season opener, but not in a national tournament.

A disappointed Jack Leaman could only sum up the night's happenings by saying "we just didn't play that well." Simple, precise, to the point, and true.

Celtics clobber Capital, 124-103, clinching title

BOSTON (AP) — John Havlicek dumped in 29 points as the Boston Celtics stopped the Capital Bullets 129-103 Sunday night at Boston Garden to clinch the Atlantic Division title in the National Basketball Association.

Havlicek, who had 15 points in the third period, and the rest of Boston's starting five were rested in the second period when Coach Tom Heinsohn sent to his bench.

Center Dave Cowens was the only regular to score in the second session when he made a field goal before sitting down in place of seven-foot Hank Finkel. Cowens finished the game with 18 points and Don Chaney of the Celtics added 16.

After taking a 43-29 lead at the end of the first period, Heinsohn worked into the game Finkel, Artie Williams, Paul Westphal, Steve Kuberski and Paul Silas. Like the regulars, the substitutes kept up Boston's running game.

Westphal had 10 points and Williams 8 in the second period. Kuberski and Finkel each scored four points.

For a seven-minute stretch during the second quarter, the Celtics outscored the Bullets 20-8.

Should the Celtics and Knicks be tied in the standings at the end of the regular season, Boston would be declared the winner because the Celtics defeated the Knicks five timms in seven games this season.

Arabs lift US oil embargo

VIENNA, Austria (AP) — The Arab oil nations announced yesterday they are lifting their oil embargo against the United States in recognition of United States efforts to promote a settlement with Israel. But they said they would review their decision in two months.

The ban will be lifted as of today, according to Saudi Arabia's oil minister, Ahmed Zaki Yamani.

Yamani said the United States "will get enough oil for its requirements." Shipments would begin reaching U.S. shores in 60 days at the most, he said.

Yamani declined to say whether the Arab states would restore over-all cutbacks in oil production imposed at the time of the embargo. The cutbacks caused a world squeeze and more than tripled prices in the last five months.

In what appeared to be a significant split in the Arab view of the use of the oil weapon, Libya and Syria opposed lifting the embargo.

Yamani said their opposition was "a question of timing." He said all Arab countries had agreed to the move in principle.

Algerian oil minister Belad Abdesselam said Syria and Libya did not think the proper time had come to reward the United States.

"They believe the U.S. change of position is not enough...and consequently believe the time has not come to life the embargo," he said.

The United States was getting about 10 to 14 per cent of its oil from Arab producers before the boycott was imposed. Oil experts said it would take between six and eight weeks for Arab oil to reach the United States.

In Washington, Deputy Press Secretary Gerald L. Warren said the White House had not been formally notified of the ministers' action and declined comment pending that notification.

Vets sell apples to finance protest

By MARY MUIRHEAD
MDC Staff

March 29, is the day Richard Nixon has set aside to "honor" Vietnam Veterans. The UMass Veterans have chosen this day "to show their dissatisfaction with the Nixon Administration's mistreatment of Veterans and lack of meaningful Veteran's legislation."

On this day, hopefully, 200 Massachusetts' Veterans will arrive on Washington D.C.'s street corners to sell apples. The idea behind "Project Apple" is reminiscent of the days after World War I, when there was no GI benefit program. Many veterans were forced to sell apples and pencils on street corners to support themselves and their families. The event was so embarrassing that a Benefit Program was soon started.

It is not that the UMass Veterans are ungrateful for what they have received. They cannot understand, however, why the Veterans of World War II were treated so much better than Vietnam Veterans.

Currently, the House of Representatives has approved a 13.6 per cent increase in GI Benefits; the Senate wants a 25 per cent increase and Mr. Nixon won't approve anything over 8 per cent.

In an interview with the Collegian, Al Metzner, acting president of the UMass Veterans Club, outlined some differences between benefits received after WW II and benefits received by Vietnam Veterans.

At present, each unmarried veteran receives a flat living expense of

Ralph Nader spoke to a crowd of about 1500 people in the Student Union Ballroom yesterday as a part of a four-day tour of five Massachusetts colleges culminating in a speech on energy policy to be delivered before a joint session of the legislature Thursday March 21.

See "Citizen Nader" by Fred Weiss on page 9

During the highlight of his speech, Nader denounced the American Petroleum Institute's figures on proven oil reserves of 38 billion barrels as "utter nonsense," and said that with the oil there is in Alaska, we have approximately 285 billion barrels, enough to last at least until the turn of the century.

"Let us not be brainwashed by an oil industry that spends millions of dollars on propaganda machine telling us there is no oil," he said.

Ervin to visit UMass

Senator Sam Ervin, Democrat from North Carolina, will receive a Speaker of Year Award at the Delta Sigma Rho-Tau Kappa Alpha National Conference (DSR) to be hosted by the UMass Department of Communication Studies and Debate Union on March 27th-30th.

The DSR-TKA is an honorary forensic league whose members must be active for two years in a college forensics program, meet with the approval of the director of the program and its members and be in the upper 35 per cent of their class. Events at the conference, which is held at a different school every spring, will include: Two-Man Debates on energy; Four-Man Debates on Amnesty for Viet Nam Draft Evaders; both Persuasive and Extemporaneous Speaking and a Student Congress.

Participants will include 350 people from 27 states and 67 schools, including such schools as American University, University of Missouri and the University of Rhode Island. This conference will determine national champions in all events.

Bicycle thefts: A few ounces of prevention to help you keep on riding

By FRITS GEURTSEN
MDC Staff

(Second in a three-part series on Bicycling)

The only thing on this campus that's stolen more frequently than bicycles is money. Last year alone, 79 bicycles were reported stolen on campus, and police estimate that at least as many were never reported, for various reasons.

In an effort to reduce the number of bicycle thefts, the Department of Public Safety last year set aside a week in which bicycles were registered free of charge. Social security numbers were engraved onto the bikes and decals were also affixed.

The only thing on this campus that's stolen more frequently than bicycles is money, according to statistics released by the Department of Public Safety.

Diana White, Staff Assistant for the Department, said "Most of the bikes that have been stolen this year have been unregistered, which indicates that our program has had some effect. We estimate that of the four thousand bikes on campus, about one thousand are registered."

The first week in May will be registration week this year. Registration is done at the Dining Commons and is available to everyone, non-students included.

White also advised bicycle owners to keep a record of the bike's serial number, make, model, model number, color and distinguishing characterisitcs. Without these facts the police have little to go on when a bicycle is reported stolen.

Some anti-theft tips are to be found in a pamphlet concerning bicycle theft put out by the police:

Don't leave your bike unlocked, even for a few minutes.

If fire and safety laws permit, keep your bike inside at night.

If you lock you bike outside, place it in a well-lit or open area where an attempted theft will be observed.

When you lock your bike, secure the bike frame and both wheels to a tree, fance, or pole. Many 10-speeds have a quick release mechanism on the front wheel. It is a good idea to remove the front wheel, place it next to the rear wheel and lock both wheels and the frame to the tree. Better yet, take the front wheel with you.

If you lock your bike to a tree (particularly at night), make sure the tree is a sturdy one. Bike thieves have been known to chop down trees ato get at a bicycle.

The Department has done testing on a variety of bike locks and the results, both positive and negative, are to be found in their pamphlet, which is available to anyone at the station.

The Tech and Kryptonite locks were most highly recommended, although they limit the places a bike can be locked up. Aircraft cables and chains were less highly recommended because they require padlocks which don't pose much of a problem to the average bicycle thief.

The Department of Public Safety urges all bicycle owners to insure their expensive bikes. According to Diana White, there is a bicycle insurance sold through members of the National Bicycle Dealer's Association which cannot be collected on in Massachusetts because it has not been approved by the Mass. Insurance Commission. Most homeowners insurances will cover bicycles, either directly or by a special rider.

CC operating budget passed

By MARSHA VENUTI
MDC Staff

The Board of Governors of the Campus Center and Student Union Complex unanimously passed the Campus Center Operating Budget for fiscal year 1975 at last Thursday's meeting.

The rest of the budget for next year, which includes capital expenditures and debt service payment, will be considered at a later date.

The total budget for 1975 is expected to be $8½ million. The Campus Center is expected to bring in $6 million revenue, according to Steve Kenney, chairperson of the finance committee of the Board, and the other $2½ million will be made up by student fees.

Student fees are also used to pay the interest on the CC building, and to fund student services such as the crafts shop and the program council, he said.

What is happening is that the CC is actually operating at a loss and has been since it opened in 1970, Kenney said. He said that the loss has decreased and the goal is to reach operation at zero deficit by fiscal year 1976. Then more student fees will go to paying off the building, he said, and eventually the CC will operate at a profit so that it will be able to offer more services and eliminate the student fee.

"The Board of Governors is trying to make the best of a lousy situation," Kenny said in a Collegian interview. "The initial proposal for financing the building was that the students were going to pay for the concourse level, and the state was going to pay for the upper levels of the building. However, it ended up that the students are now paying for the financing of the entire building."

The reason for the state's change from the original proposal is very unclear, Kenney said. He said that he thinks the students are getting screwed and that the state ought to be paying for part of the building.

The budget is made up by the CC staff, and then reviewed by the director and the business manager of the CC. The finance committee of the Board then makes suggestions or demands, and when they are satisfied the completed budget goes before the whole Board for approval.

Jim Lindsey, chairperson of the Board, said that the budget for next year is the most realistic one yet devised for the CC. He said that past inefficient management techniques have been effectively dealt with by the new director of the CC, John Corker. There have been labor savings, increased margin on products, and better overall management, Lindsey said.

Harrison's "Great MacDaddy": designed as total theatre

By PAT GRUNDY

"He's different — different in every way."

"Right," I said, "That's what makes him so interesting. "Besides," I added as an afterthought, "We evoke most of the images we see in others."

"Ah, you're crazy too," responded my friend.

"Right again," I said. "No great genius is without a mixture of madness (Aristotle)." We both laughed. He because he didn't understand, and I because I did.

We were talking about Paul Carter Harrison, playwright-director and professor who is presently holding a joint appointment here on the UMass campus in the Afro-American Studies Department and the Theatre Department. Professor Harrison came to this campus in 1972 among other nationally known artist such as Archie Shepp, Max Roach. Nelson Stevens and Diana Ramos. Yes, Paul Carter Harrison is a peculiar man and his appearance and attitude to life leaves an indelible impression on the minds of all who come in contact with him. And the same can be said for his work which includes "The Great MacDaddy," which is now having a very successful run at the Negro Ensemble Company in New York. Mr. Harrison says his work is designed to involve total theatre as understood from an African reference. Like all important ceremonies, the staged event is developed in a non-linear fashion which is precisely how we confront reality. What is focused in the event are the contectual relationships rather than a beginning, middle, and end. The context is called the "mode" which contains forces such as character, light, set pieces and music. These elements are orchestrated in a manner which focus the intention of the event. This should result in a ritualistic focusing of the images within the play. "What is important here," he stressed, "is the reliance on the African sensibility that has been retained in the African-American consciousness despite our intimacy with Euro-American values and aesthetic priorities." He stated that the residue of African sensibility then informs the Aesthetic choices that are made in the theatrical event. And while there is always influence resulting from our Euro-American experience, the essences of our reality germinate from our unique perception of our Africanness. Implicit in that perception is rhythm which is as important to Afro-American modes of experience as wit is to European drawing-room comedy.

Harrison says he began to develop these concepts while living and working in Europe. He began to concretize them when he returned to America to teach at Howard University. A model of this concept can be found in his earlier, "Tabernacle" which has been performed widely in this country and has recently been included in an anthology which includes such writers as Aristophanes, Sophocles, Ibsen and Shaw. The anthology is called "The Design of Drama." "The concept was further investigated," he continued, "when I conceived the original production of Melvin Van Peeples' poems resulting in the staged production, under my direction, of "Ain't Supposed To Die A Natural Death," at Sacramento State University in California." Because of its apparent success in California, it was brought to Broadway in 1971 where it enjoyed a successful run under the direction of Gil Moses. The next opportunity to focus this concept was when he directed Aishah Rahman's "Lady Day: — A Musical Tragedy," in New York in 1972. The music was scored by Archie Shepp.

Playright-director Paul Carter Harrison, currently holding a joint appointment here in the Afro-American Studies Dept. and the Theatre Dept., says his work, "The Great MacDaddy", is designed to involve total theatre as understood from an African reference.

Considering the newness of this concept in America, I asked Mr. Harrison what people had influenced his work thus far. He stated "Institutions like Black music, church and family and the single literary influence being Jean Toomer's "Cane."

When asked about the differences between Black Art and Euro-American Art, he replied that, "the Euro-American Art owns an aesthetic which reflects individualism thus it is invariably materialistic as opposed to being spiritual." "Black art thus is testimental and it thrives on the collective focusing of Black reality. "The individual contributes to a collectively conceived idea. It emanates from an impulse to unify the collective sense of self. In his book "Drama of Nommo," which was published last Spring by Grove Press and can be purchased in the Bookstore, the aesthetic priority of African-American people is discussed with a view on the African Continuum. The Great MacDaddy was first performed under his direction at Sacramento State University to work out problems of production; then performed at Seattle Washington at Black Arts West and was directed by Rafic Bey and selected for the Governor's Festival in Olympia, Washington. It is now in production at the Negro Ensemble Company under the direction of Douglas Turner Ward. Himself a prominent writer and actor. "I had preferred NEC to do "MacDaddy" because they are the most institutionalized, thus permanent Black Theatre Company in the country and has immediate access to the mythic relationship applied in the work." "As a talent resource they have produced many great writers and actors who are enjoying successful careers in theatre and film." "In my production, Ward brings a very convincing clarity to what could be a difficult event to handle." "He's managed to handle the symbolic references to Black life in a way which does not make the work obscure." "It is a very articulate production of those complex African values which are germane to the Afro-American experience. The show has been extended to the 14th of April at the St. Marks Playhouse in New York. However, it may be moved to a larger house uptown.

Mr. Harrison says he is now working on a new play which deals with a multi-media environment and he is currently generating this project in the Theatre Dept. The entire event will take place in a television mode and he says he's trying to work out technical problems of manipulating this mode so that T.V. camera images will have an intrinsic value in the staged event. This year he has completed two film scripts for Hollywood Productions, one being "The Sam Cooke Story." He has also edited a new anthology of plays which reflects a modal style of theatre. "Kuntu Drama" will be out late this Spring. On April 4th he will be presenting a formal paper on Black Theatre for the Five-College Seminar. On April 19th he will direct a recital version of Aishah Rahman's "Lady Day". Time and place will be posted.

Harrison states that Black theatre is the most active and vital theatre movement in the country today. In the beginning it suffered from imitation of standards of excellence found in Euro-American theatre traditions. Some good, some bad. While no attempt is being made to dismiss the finer models of the American tradition, new Black writers are gaining greater confidence in the significance of their own experience which informs the credibility of their own standards of excellence.

Pre-vet club plans 100-mile marathon

By JUDY FRIEDLAND
MDC Staff

Mitch Galanek will lead a 100-mile marathon to Boston on Sunday, April 7 as part of a campaign for institution of a veterinary college in New England. The marathon will precede a public meeting of the Joint Committee on State Education scheduled for Tuesday, April 9.

The hearing will concern the formation of a regional school of veterinary medicine in Massachusetts. Senate Bill S-1298, filed by Senator John F. Conte (D-Worcester), calls for the conveyance of the land and buildings comprising the Grafton State Hospital to the trustees of UMass for use as a regional veterinary college.

According to Galanek, Marathon Coordinator of the UMass Pre-Veterinary Club and a member of the UMass Rugby Team, the run will hopefully make more people aware of the fact that there isn't a single veterinary college in the six state New England area.

The Pre-Vet Club is hoping for approximately 25 runners, who would run approximately four miles a piece. Instead of carrying a baton, they will convey a petition signed by people in the Amherst area in support of the bill. If the number of runners exceeds 25, the relay will be done in pairs.

According to Robert Perry, Vice President of the club, they have asked for news media coverage of the run, which will start at the Campus Center, go down North Pleasant Street, and follow Route 9 across the state.

"We want to hit cities such as Worcester, Framingham, and Natick so that in case people who are out on Sunday will notice us, and learn the reason we are running.

The club is also chartering buses from UMass to the State House. The buses will leave campus at 7 a.m. on Tuesday, April 9. The club hopes to get a sizeable turnout. Jim Fleming, President of the club has also visited the state university campuses in the other New England states, urging support of the bill.

The club also urges people to contact their state representative and senators in support of S1298, and-or the members of the Joint Committee that is hearing the bill.

Talk of building a regional veterinary school has been going on for 10 years. A study conducted by the New England Board of Higher Education recommended last July that Worcester be the site of the school, in conjunction with the UMass Medical School. As of yet, however, UMass President Robert C. Wood has not formerly discussed the idea with his trustees.

Dr. Wood's approval is not necessary, however, for the plans to become final. Legislation similar to S1298 has been introduced into the other six legislatures, and if it is approved by four or more states, a regional veterinary school will be established. If the Massachusetts Legislature goes along, the school would be built in Worcester, despite a possible rejection by President Wood.

Parking Comt. being reviewed

By BARBARA VOORHEES
MDC Staff

The legality of the work of the Parking Appeals Committee (PAC) will be reviewed by a committee of students, faculty members, and administrators in the next few weeks.

Chancellor Randolph W. Bromery has named his special assistant Tim Bornstein chairman of the six-member committee which will make recommendations to the chancellor by April 15.

Bornstein told the Collegian that questions had been raised about the status and procedures of PAC by Judge Luke Ryan of Hampshire District Court. PAC has been granting dismissals of violations within the jurisdiction of that court.

If the present system is found to be illegal the review committee will design a new appeals process.

Village voice editor to speak

Kuttner has worked in a variety of media jobs ranging from political speech writing to being Program Director for WBAI-FM, a radical radio station that operates on a non-commercial basis, using donations for revenue.

He has written extensively and published in the New York Times Magazine, New York Times Book Review, Harpers, Saturday Review, and Progressive, among others.

Faculty, students, and the general public are invited. Admission is free.

Sweet Pie nabbed

Paul A. Winer, better known as "Sweet Pie", was arrested Friday afternoon at 1:35 p.m. and charged with indecent exposure, following a complaint from a student.

Winer, who lives in Wilmington, Vt., was sunning himself on the grass near Orchard Hill totally naked, according to police.

Winer told police he had "permission from the students to sun himself."

Registrar closing

Due to the continued backlog of grade corrections, transcript requests, and other related work, the Undergraduate Registrar's Office finds it necessary to extend the policy of closing on Wednesdays through April 24th. The purpose of these closings is to allow the Registration and Records Offices an opportunity to restore their files to working order so that proper service may be provided.

Vets sell apples to raise funds for Washington protest

$220 per month with no additional allowances for school tuition. This rate is adequate for those attending a school where the tuition is low, but this amount would far from cover the expenses of a more expensive school.

Veterans comprise only 2 per cent of the enrollment in ivy league schools compared with approximately 50 per cent after WW II, when the government did fund part of tuition costs.

In October of 1973 the Director of Financial Aid at Purdue University determined that Veteran's Benefits came under the classification of grants. Therefore, any veteran receiving benefits was not eligible for financial aid at that school.

Al Metzner detailed some of the problems in organizing "Project Apple". Each public bus to be used to bus the Veterans to Washington would cost $750. There is available, however, a UMass bus which would cost only $450 if funded by the Student Senate or by a department at the University. They are also trying to procure a gym or some similar place where the veterans can sleep while in Washington.

The apples being used by "Project Apple" so far have been bought at Atkins Farm for $8 per bushel, which runs into quite an expense. They would like to find either donations or discounts from other sources. The money collected from students in the Campus Center will go towards transportation costs to Washington. It was estimated that $70 was collected on the first day.

The veterans will contact Senators Brooke and Kennedy and Representatives Conte and Heckler, all of Massachusetts, to see if they will provide needed support.

Grand jury to go to Congress

WASHINGTON (AP) - U.S. District Judge John J. Sirica ordered the Watergate grand jury's Nixon report turned over to the House impeachment inquiry yesterday, noting that "it draws no accusatory conclusions."

He said he had no other choice, declaring that delivery to the House Judiciary Committee is "eminently proper, and indeed, obligatory."

The judge said "it seems incredible that grand jury matters should...be unavailable to the House of Representatives in a proceeding of so great import as an impeachment investigation," when such reports often go to police investigations and disbarment proceedings.

"We deal in a matter of the most critical moment to the nation, an impeachment investigation involving the President of the United States," Sirica said in a 22-page opinion.

The judge allowed lawyers for the seven men indicted March 1 in the Watergate cover-up two days to appeal the ruling.

Sirica received the report and recommendation that it be placed in the hands of the Judiciary Committee at the time of the indictments.

John J. Wilson, the lawyer for H.R. Haldeman and John D. Ehrlichman, and attorneys for the other defendants opposed transmittal to the House. One reason was that leaks from the report might prejudice their clients' ability to get a fair trial, they said.

Wilson said he will file an appeal by Wednesday afternoon. He would not discuss the matter further.

Sirica said "the person on whom the report focuses, the President of the United States, has not objected to its release to the committee. Other persons are involved only indirectly."

He thus gave the first official confirmation of widely published reports that the secret report centers on the actions of the President in the aftermath of the Watergate break-in.

At the White House Deputy Press Secretary Gerald L. Warren said Nixon had been informed of the order but gave no presidential reaction.

"It draws no accusatory conclusions," Sirica said of the document. "It deprives no one of an official forum in which to respond. It is not a substitute for indictments where indictments might properly issue."

"It contains no recommendations...It renders no moral or social judgments. The report is a simple and straightforward compilation of information gathered by the grand jury and no more."

Reps. Peter W. Rodine Jr., D-N.J. and Edward Hutchinson, R-Mich.-the chairman and the senior GOP member of the House Judiciary Committee-said they were pleased at the decision.

"The grand jury report was obviously intended for the committee and the committee should have it," Hutchinson said.

The grand jury had recommended that the materials it turned over to Sirica be given to the House, the judge said, because the evidence has "a material bearing on matters within the primary jurisdiction of the committee in its current inquiry."

Sirica said it is up to the committee to decide whether to accede to a request by President Nixon's lawyers that they be allowed to review the report.

Gov't must detail information requests

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court yesterday refused to interfere with a lower court order that imposed specific burdens on government attorneys attempting to deny access to documents sought under the Freedom of Information Act.

The Supreme Court declined without comment to hear a government challenge to an order imposed by the U.S. Circuit Court for the District of Columbia in suits brought against the Civil Service Commission and the Defense Department.

Overturning decisions by trial judges, the appellate court said the government must provide the courts and the plaintiffs a detailed description and index of secret documents requested under the Freedom of Information Act.

Under present practice, the appellate judges said, lawyers seeking government files cannot present an effective arguments because they know little more than the general content of the documents.

The government, on the other hand, can present a convincing argument against disclosure because it has the benefit of full knowledge of the contents, the court said.

A judge, even if he inspects the documents in private, is ill prepared to determine the validity of government arguments against disclosure because he can't call on the expertise the plaintiffs may have, the court said.

The case involved an attempt by a law professor, Robert G. Vaughn, to obtain Civil Service Commission reports evaluating personnel management in government agencies, and a similar effort by Gilbert A. Cuneo to obtain portions of a Defense Department manuel on government contract auditing procedures.

In other action today, the court:

—Agreed to decide when federal court may step in to halt state court proceedings aimed at closing adult movie theaters.

—Refused to revive an Oklahoma state regulation prohibiting sale of natural gas "at a price so low as to cause physicial waste."

Fierce fighting subsides in Viet central highlands

SAIGON (AP) — The bloodiest fighting in the central highlands since the cease-fire 14 months ago tapered off yesterday, but the Saigon command reported its forces were ready for fresh attacks by a North Vietnamese regiment of 2,000 men.

The command said 348 North Vietnamese and 72 South Vietnamese were killed and 111 government troops wounded in a half-dozen battles just to the north of the provincial capital of Kontum over the weekend.

Field reports said another 275 government rangers were missing from a 400-man battalion that was overrun Saturday, and that a second ranger battalion suffered 25 men killed and 23 wounded.

The Viet Cong delegation to the two-party Joint Military Commission in Saigon said Communist-led forces inflicted heavy losses on two of three South Vietnamese ranger battalions.

The Viet Cong reported 230 South Vietnamese troops killed or captured but made no mention of losses to the Communist side. The Viet Cong have never officially reported casualties to the Communist side.

Field reports said the North Vietnamese objective was to gain control of Highway 5B to complete a supply route from depots in the triborder region of South Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia to South Vietnam's central coast.

Most of the South Vietnamese positions that came under heavy artillery attack and ground assault were strung along the highway at points 2½ to 10 miles northeast of Kontum. The highway also leads to a South Vietnamese district town to the north.

Lt. Col. Le Trung Hien, chief spokesman for the Saigon command, said the North Vietnamese had succeeded in cutting the roadway in several sections.

In CAmbodia, government troops for the first time in about a year seized control of the town of Siem Reap-Kandal, south of Phnom Penh, military sources reported.

Lt. Col. Danh Kone, assistant commander of the 48th Brigade, said his men, backed by 20 armored vehicles, entered Siem Reap-Kandal, 13 miles south of the capital, on Monday, and met little resistance.

Siem Reap-Kandal was lost to insurgents during the big dry season offensive early in 1973, and was a headquarters for rebels attacking Phnom Penh last month.

Peace prevented by battles

Israel and Syria clash again

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Israeli and Syrian troops exchanged artillery and tank fire across the October war ceasefire lines for the seventh straight day yesterday. The Tel Aviv military command said it was in one of the heaviest days of battle in recent weeks.

The command said two of its soldiers were killed and three wounded.

The Golan Heights shooting, which lasted five hours, came as Arab oil ministers in Vienna announced an end to the Arab oil embargo against the United States in appreciation for U.S. efforts to achieve a Middle East settlement.

Syria and Libya opposed the decision.

In Washington U.S. Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger said it would be at least two weeks before the start of serious negotiations with Israel and Syria on a troop separation in the Golan Heights.

Kissinger leaves Washington Sunday for a trip to Moscow and London and is expected to return March 29 for the Israeli-Syrian peace talks.

On another issue Britain and the United States announced they would help Egypt clear the Suez Canal to make it available to international shipping for the first time since it was closed in the 1967 six-day war.

In Tel Aviv, Israeli Defense Minister Moshe Dayan said a Middle East peace must come in stages, and that failure to come to an agreement with Syria over a separation of forces could destroy further progress with Egypt on a general settlement.

Earlier Dayan told parliament that the United States, the Soviet Union, Britain and France had sold $3½ billion worth of arms to the Arabs in the past year.

He said 90 per cent of the Arab armament came from the Soviet Union and listed Moscow's major arms clients as Egypt, Syria and Iraq.

He said Washington had sold arms to Jordan and Saudi Arabia, the British had supplied Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Iraq and France was arming Libya.

Reporting the Golan Heights clash, a military communique broadcast by Damascus Radio said, "Our heavy artillery concentrated an intensive barrage on enemy positions, gun explacements and reinforcement locations dealing fierce blows to 14 enemy areas."

The communique again charged the Israelis had provoked the shelling by attempting to fortify their positions in the central and northern sector of the 300 square-mile salient on the Damascus-Kunaitra road which the Jewish forces captured in last October's war.

Kissinger mideast trip delayed

WASHINGTON (AP) - Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger is sidetracking for at least two weeks the start of serious negotiations with Israel and Syria on a troop separation in the Golan Heights.

Kissinger will hold another "preliminary meeting" today with Abba Eban, the Israeli foreign minister. But officials acknowleged that detailed discussions would not begin until Kissinger completes a trip to Moscow and London.

He leaves Sunday and is expected back on March 29. One of the purposes of the Soviet visit is to discuss strategy for bridging the "very wide gap" said to stand in the way of a settlement.

Kissinger told his top assistants late last week that he was prepared to make his fifth tour of the Middle East since November. But this venture, tentatively planned for late April, may slip back to May, and one top official emphasized that the secretary would not go there unless Israel and Syria narrowed their differences considerably.

Meanwhile, the State Department confirmed that the U.S. Navy would cooperate in clearing unexploded mines, bombs, shells and missiles from the Suez Canal and its banks.

The brief announcement said technical advice and training would be provided to the Egyptians at their request. Assistance is also expected from the British Navy.

The canal has been closed since the six-day war of 1967. Its reopening and the rebuilding of Suez City and Port Said were negotiated by Kissinger in January as part of a disengagement agreement between Israel and Egypt.

Officials here attribute the negotiation slowdown partly to Kissinger's tight schedule, including the Soviet trip and its potential impact on the virtually stalled Geneva negotiations on a new U.S.-Soviet treaty limiting nuclear weapons.

But they also underscore the extreme difficulty anticipated initially in bridging the differences between Israel and Syria.

Labor wins important vote as Conservatives abstain

LONDON (AP) - Prime Minister Harold Wilson won a major victory last night with House of Commons approval of his minority Labor government's legislative program.

The vote was 294-7 in favor of the government in the 635-member house, indicating the opposition Conservatives had abstained. Labor has 299 votes in the Commons and the Conservatives have 295.

Voting came at the end of a tense five-day debate involving at one point an opposition move that might have brought down the 15-day-old government.

Wilson's Laborites took a stand earlier yesterday on pay restraints that took the steam out of the opposition challenge.

Employment Secretary Michael Foot told the House of Commons there would be a "continued statutory duty...to enforce the pay code."

The Conservative and Liberal parties then withdrew a proposed amendment to the government's legislative program. The amendment formally outlawed big pay boosts until a voluntary system of wage restraints was arranged. Had the majority voted in favor of it, the Labor government would have been under pressure to resign.

The pay code had been given the force of law by the ousted Conservative government of Edward Heath. It sets the annual permissible wage increase at 7½ per cent. About nine million workers already have had wage claims settled on this basis, whicle nearly three million others are still negotiating deals.

Foot said the state will seek powers to abolish the controls when a voluntary system of restraint emerges as a replacement.

It was interpreted as the Labor government's way of saying it will not be as inflexible as its predecessors in the coal miner's strike.

Nixon to hold conference

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Nixon will fly to Houston today for a prime-time, nationally televised and broadcast question-and-answer session with a panel of newsmen.

White House aides held out the possibility that the President would make another public appearance in Houston besides the 8 p.m. EDT session with members of the National Association of Broadcasters. But they said details were yet to be worked out.

FBI nabs suspect in Minn.; other cases remain unsolved

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

The FBI said yesterday it had arrested a Minnesota man in connection with the kidnaping of Eunice Kronholm, but said it had no word on the whereabouts of the banker's wife. The agency said a $200,000 ranson had been paid.

A French businessman kidnaped in Argentina almost three months ago was released and is on his way home, but there were no major developments in two other abductions.

Officials of a food giveaway funded by the father of newspaper heiress Patricia Hearst prepared to announce changes in the program to meet the demands of the girl's terrorist kidnapers.

And in Buenos Aires, Esso Argentina officials waited for information about the American executive for whom they paid a record $14.2 million ranson last week.

In the Krenholm case, FBI Director Clarence M. Kelley announced in Washington that James William Johnson, 27, of Lakeville, Minn., was seized in his home town and charged with voilating the Hobbs Act dealing with extortion.

Kelley said the FBI was "using every resource at its disposal to find Mrs. Krenholm." The 46-year-old woman is the second wife of Gunnar Krenholm, president of the Drovers State Bank in South St. Paul.

Mrs. Krenholm disappeared from her suburban Line Lakes, Minn., home Friday morning. The FBI said her car had been discovered in a parking lot in another Mineeapolis suburb.

Earlier, a spokesman for Krenholm said he had paid an undisclosed amount of ransom for his wife, but had no word of her.

In Paris, a spokesman for Peugeot announced that Yves Boisset, 36, the production manager of the auto maker's Argentina subsidiary, had been released in good health and was en route to France.

Miners strike ends

CHARLESTON, W. Va. (AP) — Coal miners returned to work today in the last remaining holdout areas of West Virginia, bringing a three-week-old strike to an end.

"It looks like everyone's back to work," said Ed Stone, District 29 executive board member in Welch. He said most of the dissident miners in McDowell and Mercer counties reported to work on the midnight shift this morning.

A spokesman for the West Virginia Coal Association said it would be "a couple of days" before production levels return to normal.

The strike began Feb. 25 at the Maitland No. 9 mine in McDowell County when miners said they were unable to get enough gasoline to commute to work.

The work stoppage spread across the southern West Virginia coal fields during the next few days, eventually putting 27,600 miners off the job.

After an earlier attempt to satisfy the miners failed, Gov. Arch A. Moore Jr. last week suspended for 30 days the quarter-tank gasoline rule which miners said had caused most of the problem. The rule required that service stations sell only to cars with less than a quarter-tank of gasoline.

Miners began returning to work Thursday, but there were several holdout areas.

Stone said about 40 per cent of the 6,600 miners in McDowell and Mercer counties did not return by the weekend, but they appeared to be back on the job today.

Oil embargo ended

Speaking after the ministers' meeting, Yamani said the United States will get enough oil for its requirements.

He said the United States will be getting at least one million barrels a day from Saudi Arabia alone and more supplies from other countries.

He indicated the total Arab exports to the United States would be about the same as they were last September.

The decision apparently did not take into account extra quantities of oil that U.S. growth in the last five months would normally have required.

The United States since the embargo began have lowered oil needs to a certain extent. Nixon administration officials had stressed previously most of their restrictions would remain even if the embargo was lifted.

Yamani said exports to West Germany and Italy will also increase to the pre-embargo level as they have in recent months to France, Britain, Belgium and Japan — all considered friendly countries.

So-called "neutral" countries have suffered a 15 per cent cutback since December and unfriendly countries were embargoed.

Yamani made it clear that the embargo against Holland would remain in force. He said the position of Holland and Denmark remained "unfriendly."

Students charter buses for annual migration to Florida

DAYTONA BEACH, Fla. (AP) — Thousands of Northern college students, determined to beat the gasoline shortage, are chartering buses to bring them to Florida for their annual rite of spring.

Others are phoning ahead and checking the gas situation with the Florida Highway Patrol.

A patrol dispatcher said he gets a phone call about every five minutes from anxious Northern or Canadian students planning a trip South.

Officials estimated on Monday that more then 40,000 students had arrived in Daytona Beach to soak up the sun by day and to party at night. They are the vanguard of some 100,000 expected to pour into the city by Easter Sunday.

"We chartered 11 buses and made the 1,800-mile trip in about 48 hours," said Joe Spengler, 20, an elementary education major at St. Cloud Minn. State College.

"A lot of people decided to make the trip this year by bus because of the gas shortage," he said. "It was cheaper and a lot of fun. We had plenty to drink aboard the bus and we got totally loaded all the way down."

But Joe Brisk, another St. Cloud State student who drove his car to Florida, reported no trouble finding gasoline.

Leeta Kolodziejczyk, 17, of Buffalo, N.Y., said she and seven girl friends decided to make the trip by plane.

Hotel and motel owners who had a lean winter because of the gas shortage report business is booming.

B & M sickout called

EAST DEERFIELD (AP) — More than 40 Boston & Maine Corp. trainmen called in sick yesterday in a protest against B&M work rules.

A United Transportation Workers spokesman said the protest was against a new requirement that B & M brakemen be available for work several days a week and that they provide their own transportation to work assignments.

A spokesman said the workers also were protesting an alleged refusal by union officials to listen to their complaints.

Alan G. Dustin, vice president for operations of the railroad, said 41 trainmen called in sick. He said usually there are 40 to 50 trainmen assigned to work at the yard.

Dustin said it was not a strike but "an illegal walkout, wildcat or whatever you want to call it." He said it was a local incident and that railroad and union officials were trying to get the men to report for work.

Dustin said the union and management had a signed agreement to the rules.

Self-defense OK'd

BOSTON (AP) - Defendants have a constitutional right to represent themselves in court "even in cases where the accused is harming himself by insisting on conducting his own defense," the state Appeals Court has ruled.

The court overturned the 1972 conviction of Raymond D. Mott of New Bedford on a charge of possession of heroin with intent to sell.

Mott was sentenced to seven years in prison, following his trial in Bristol County Superior Court.

Mott's appeal maintained that the trial judge denied motions requesting that Mott be allowed to represent himself during the trial.

In the decision the state court ruled that "respect for individual autonomy requires that he the defendant be allowed to go to jail under his own banner, if he so desires and if he makes the choice with eyes wide open."

HALIFAX (AP) - The Norwegian-built motor vessel Grey Master begins a ferry service between the Maritime provinces and the New England states March 29.

The new 407-feet vessel with a capacity of 60 and semi-trailer trucks and 75 automobiles and accommodations for 12 passengers will sail between Halifax and Gloucester, Mass., three times a week.

E. G. Hare, marketing manager for Breton Agencies Ltd. of Halifax, general agents for the vessel's owners, said the service will add an extra dimension to commercial transportation between Atlantic Canada and New England. He said that with the fuel shortage and soaring costs for moving freight by highway, truck operators can cut costs by shortening their highway mileage between points in the two regions.

The triple-deck Grey Master will make the Halifax-Gloucester crossing in 22 hours.

Shield law chances

BOSTON (AP) - Massachusetts could have had a limited newsmen's shield law this year if publishers had wanted one, according to the Senate chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

But publishers who have been pressing for the law for the past three years reversed their stand at a committee hearing last week, and opposed the bill, saying it would open the door to future regulations and possible repression of the press.

"I think a limited shield bill could have emerged this yyar," said Sen. John J. Conte, D-Worcester, "but the testimony at the hearing indicates that the press is not too keen on it, so I don't think the committee will be.

"We don't want to give somebody something they don't want."

Testifying before the committee, William L. Plante, executive editor of the Essex County newspapers, said the protection of the First Amendment is all the press has ever needed and all it needs now.

The limited shield law referred to by Conte would protect the confidentiality of a newsman's sources, but would not apply to a reporter observing a criminal act and would be restricted to actual reporters and editors.

Mass. RR supported

NORTH ADAMS (AP) - The executive director of the Berkshire County Development Commission says he doubts that Penn Central service along two lines in the county will be abandoned.

The lines, which link Pittsfield, Adams, South Lee and Connecticut, are marked for abandonment in a federal plan for reorganizing the bankrupt railroads of the Northeast.

"Both lines are showing a profit and I feel service will continue in Berkshire County," Alan L. Marden said Sunday.

17-year-old elected

DALTON (AP) - The Massachusetts Election Commission has been asked to look into legal problems arising from the election of a 17-year-old Hinsdale youth to the Central Berkshire Regional School District Committee. Jeffrey Arndt, a Wahconah Regional High School senior, won Hinsdale's seat on the five-member regional committee Saturday.

Under state law he would have to be 18 before he could take office. He turns 18 July 17.

Marriages peddled

BOSTON (AP) - Federal investigators have evidence that at least two rings operating in the Boston area are peddling fake marriages to aliens trying to stay in the country.

A probe by the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service currently centers on 30 marriages which may have been arranged by a Rhode Island based outfit, charged with similar offenses two years ago.

Some U.S. citizens were paid $500 to participate in fake marriages to aliens, thus permitting the latter to enter the country, investigators said.

In all, 114 fraud cases are under investigation, about 75 per cent of those involving fraudulent marriages, said Patrick F. Coomey, director of the Immigration office for the Boston district.

Many of the fake marriages have been uncovered by federal agents who detected wide differences in the ages or social status of the husband and wife. U.S. citizens must supply certain information when filling out forms requesting visas for alien spouses.

In some cases there were obvious language barriers, investigators said.

Language requirement: where everyone stands

By DEB PARTINGTON

The foreign language requirement debate continues and becomes more complex each year. The requirement is a sore spot for the faculty as well as the students.

Last year the Foreign Language Review Board proposed modifications of the foreign language requirement. This proposal resulted in few replied from the faculty. Thus, Dean J. Allen, Dean Edds, and Dean Alfange had a second ballot put out which stated that unless a majority of those eligible to vote did so for the foreign language requirement either in its present form or for some modified version of it, the foreign language requirement would be considered defunct. This action from the Deans brought results from the faculty and needless to say, they voted to retain the requirement but for varying reasons.

Approximately one third of the faculty voted against the foreign language requirement. Among the faculty members voting for the requirement;about half felt the requirement was needed as a means of a cultural insight into another country. The second half of the faculty members supporting the requirement felt that it served a utility purpose. That is, they felt that it is important to know how to work with a foreign language either in speaking or reading. Also, learning the structure of a foreign language will help students to learn the structure of the English language. There are still a small percentage of faculty members who adhere to the "traditional" stance which is, "I took the language --therefore, you should study it too."

Much of the support for the requirement comes from the natural science departments. These faculty members feel a need for a foreign language, especially German and Russian for students to be able to read non-translated scientific journals. This is primarily a utility purpose. Most resistance for the requirement come from the social sciences and not surprisingly, from the foreign language departments.

Inspite of the sound cultural and utility reason for retaining the foreign language requirements, I still prefer Dean J. Allen's stance which is that the foreign language requirement should be dropped. Requiring that a student be able to pass a fourth semester class does not insure his learning the language. A student can take the foreign language courses Pass-Fail and slide by with a minimum amount of knowledge. These students cause problems for other students in the class. They increase the size and slow the pace of the classes. These factors have a poor effect on the morale of those interested in the language and for the professors teaching the courses. With the greater number of students enrolled in the elementary courses, the professors are forced to teach more elementary level courses. The subject matter of these courses are usually unstimulating to the professors. The fact that the classes are half-filled with non-interested students can only accentuate the sinking morale of the professors.

If the foreign languege requirement is dropped, it is likely that the attendance will drop perhaps as much as 50 per cent for the first year or two. However, the number of students wanting to take the courses will rise gradually. This gradual increase will level off with approximately 90 per cent of the original attendance. With this final level of attendance, it seems more plausible to eliminate the foreign language requirement. The professors would then realize the students sitting in front of them would be there because of their ardent desire to learn the language. The lost 10 per cent would have been lost either through waivers or would have slid by with a "pass."

Finally, I feel it is important to mention that students need not sit back passively while the faculty votes to maintain the foreign language requirement. There are student members on the Academic Matters Committee and the Curriculum Committee. Students can urge these members to change the foreign language requirement. Students can also start an active campaign on campus, perhaps through the Collegian to end the foreign language requirement. Therefore, although, I do not feel that the foreign language requirement, although it has been a lengthy and complex issue for the University, is necessarily an everlasting one.

So I took the bike...

By ROBERT SHEMELIGIAN

You see, Chris and I just needed a bike for a couple minutes and we were arrested and...ah...let me start from the beginning.

This true story begins last Washington's Birthday with my friend, Christopher Bunnewith, and I trying to devise a way to park his car in twelve lot, which is way up the hill from where we live, in Dwight. We decided to take my bicycle in the car to the parking lot and coast down the hill back to the dorm, but on finding that my bike had a flat tire we decide to borrow the one beside it which was old and unsecured.

Chris carried the bike out to his car and a few minutes later I went out to meet him only to find him arrested by UMass Police. After trying to explain the situation to the, I found myself being arrested also. Chris asked them to go in the dorm and check out our story as everyone that was up including the Head of Residence knew what we were doing. To this day, we don't know why they didn't.

Listening to my rights and then being handcuffed, I could only imagine I was a guest star on Dragnet.

In the UMass police station we learned about police procedure for arrests. Chris and I were separated and I was asked by an officer to empty my pockets. Since I never know what I am carrying on me, I started whispering "Hail Mary's" as my fingers crept through my pockets. I was then carefully frisked and after they found out "I was clean", I was asked if I wanted to spend seventeen dollars to procure a Bailiff. After checking my funds I was circumstancially forced to say no. I than had to give up my belt, shoelaces, and worst of all; cigarettes.

I was led to Chris and saw that he too was dumbfounded. We were then taken to the Amherst jail to spend the night.

The Amherst jail: three cells, each seven ft. long, five wide, and seven ft. tall. In the cells were one metal bench with a foam rubber cushion on it, and a seatless toilet. That's all.

I was put in the number one cell and Chris was put in number three. This aggravated us because we were told we could be put in the same cell, and of course we each had a cellmate for the night. Mine was another misguided young adult and Chris' was an ancient drunk.

My cellmate, Joe, was telling me (as I was staring at the dried vomit covered walls and that horrible toilet) that he had been waiting in that cell since Saturday night and that his only meals were a doughnut for breakfast, a tuna fish sandwich and milk for lunch, and tuna again for dinner. They didn't give him any water so the way he drank was to catch the water running into the toilet with an old coffee cup and then drink it. I saw him do this.

Morning came eight centuries on a cement floor later. Chris and I were taken to court where we were charged with larceny. Our arraignment was set for a week later.

As it turned out, the owner of the bike was a friend of ours and decided not to press charges. The arresting officer persistantly tried to get her to sign statements branding us as bicycle thiefs but she wouldn't so the case was dismissed in court (providing we signed a statement we would not sue the police for false arrest).

The reason this story was written so late is that I was requested by the Student Attorney, for my own good, not to do anything about this situation until after the trial.

I still haven't fixed the flat on my bike.

Nudity beside the point

To The Editor:

Why is it that nine out of ten people, asked for an opinion on Sweet Pie's musical talent respond with a comment on his nudity? ("Because it's the most significant part of his act" will not be accepted without further elaboration. You have ten seconds...go). Would someone please tell me, what's the big deal over a naked body, in the Blue Wall, or running around campus?

One of the major complaints about streakers is that they make noise, rather that they are naked. But in my experience, other people make most of it, yelling at the streakers. Why?

Other people are busy bitching that streakers waste time. Aha, one point for the opposition. Whose time? Theirs. So what's it to you? Common response: They could be out working for cause X with that time. Which is, of course, quite true. But why pick on streakers? If they're the only people you've seen wasting time around here, you've got damn poor eyesight. Really, you can champion a good cause without dumping on a harmless sport in the process.

I just don't see why nudity is getting any response other than total apathy. And I certainly don't see why it's been getting the negative responses that it has, for entirely irrelevant reasons.

I begin to suspect that if streaking continues until we are all bored out of our skulls, it may perform a public service. People will be able to listen to Sweet Pie's music, and Bill Ballou might never again find it necessary to confess that he has been seen leaving the shower, naked. Doesn't that outweight any harm that you might see in the practice (I don't see any)? So stop dumping on it, just ignore it. Not because it will go away, but because it really doesn't matter.

Christ key; not bullshit

To The Editor:

re: Barbara Voorhees

If you think that religion is unfashionable, you are partially correct. Ask the Christians on this campus, we'll tell you that we have a relationship with a living God. If you want to call it religion, fine, but relationship is the key word.

This is what Josh was speaking about, the key. Jesus Christ is the key, the only key to becoming a new and happier person. Obviously you missed the whole point of his speech. If you missed this, you've missed it all. The "bullshit", as you called it, is The Truth, the only truth.

Josh and his wife were smiling because they have a relationship with Jesus Christ, The Son of God. I smile a lot too. The "dazed, glassy-eyed followers" are not gone. Open your eyes, heart and mind; we're here! We are here in the Christian groups on campus. Come to a fellowship meeting, we're in the Collegian notices. When you come, you'll find that we are dazed with the joyful fullness of the Holy Spirit; we are glassy-eyed at the Glory of God; and we are smiling because we are following down the path of the Word of Jesus Christ, Our Lord.

Non-smokers have rights too

To The Editors:

This letter is about a small grey puff on our personal horizons — not a very noticeable one and certainly not about to produce media storms. It concerns people's health and confort. Specifically, it concerns smoking.

Any of us who are thoughtful, smokers or not, have heard the arguments before; the rights of smokers vs. the rights of non-smokers. But it is not my purpose to present these arguments anew. Rather, I'd like to present a short history and a few questions.

Last year, late in the semester, a public opinion poll was printed in the Collegian concerning smoking in public places in the Campus Center. The poll's results suggested that a sizeable group of people were interested in being able to eat without an intake of cigarette smoke. Consequently, an area was set aside in the Hatch apart from the mainstream where non-smokers might eat in unpolluted peace. (In fact, you can even hear conversation over the jukebox). I, and many other people, felt this was wonderful. I believe it is the only public eating place in the University that provides this haven. However, people still smoke there — despite two not-very-large- signs announcing "NO SMOKING-PER STUDENT REQUEST".

Today, eating my ten a.m. breakfast after early morning classes, I was disturbed by smokers at two tables directly beside mine. Assuming they were uninformed of the area's status, I politely pointed to the signs and asked if they could put out their cigarettes as they were bothering me. I was met with hostile faces and rude refusals. "Yeah, I'll put it out. When I'm finished with it."

OK. How do we deal with this? How do people who are made ill by cigarettes live in this University? One smoker I spoke to suggested I eat "in the corner". What corner is there for commuting students who must eat at UMass during the day? Would it be a solution to place a permanent Big sign on the ramp entering this Hatch area informing all who pass it? There was such a sign there last week, but janitors say it disappeared over the weekend, and smoking in the area seems to have increased since this disappearance. Sign or not, should non-smoking students be responsible for enforcing this rule? Should smokers feel obliged to obey non-smoking signs — such as those in the over-crowded, poorly-ventilated buses? Should they react with hostility when approached by a non-smoker?

It is now eleven a.m. and, as I sit in this non-smoking area of the Hatch, I can see seven people within ten yards of me holding lighted cigarettes. Am I to be forced to deal on a one-to-one basis with offenders every time I feel that burning in my sinuses — to conquer my embarassment and risk bad feelings — or can we reach a more equitable solution? I hope that, in a spirit of consideration, some smokers might have an answer or two.

P.S. Some of my best friends are smokers.

UWW important to older folks

To The Editor:

I thought it might be a good idea to contribute something from an older point of view and perhaps from the other side of the language barrier. So here goes:

THE UNIVERSITY WITHOUT WALLS — RECOMMENDED FOR WOMEN

Streaking notwithstanding, those of us who have finally ventured out of the house after having raised children, find it most refreshing to have a brisk wind blowing about on campus indicating Spring. For those of us who thought we understood our country and our families there is a rude awakening: We discover all the subjects we should know about and don't.

While we feel inferior to the younger generation in many ways, there is also the discovery that maturity does have its place, and that there is a lot of milage left in us older folks after all. We have to do our streaking fully clothed from one appointment to the other, hoping to find other kindred souls.

What it all comes down to is recycled motherhood and new subject interest. We wish we could spend more time on campus and in the 5-college area, but duty calls us to other concrete commitments. All-in-all, the UWW program should be expanded to make available to more taxpayers the fine facilities of the University, whether they are in search of training, re-training or self-enrichment.

Sincerely yours
Margaret M. LaRoche

Citizen Nader

The Student Union Ballroom was packed and in walked Ralph Nader, Citizen Nader the Spartan, Consumer advocate. Looking a bit tired, his soulful deep set eyes were compelling nonetheless as he probed the audience. As he stepped up to the podium his hands alternated between searching retreats into the side pockets of his dark blue suit and thoughtful grasping of the podium for support. A blue and black tie blended poorly with his shirt, and gave him the appearance of a struggling accountant, or "last man" in the law office. Yet in spite of these materials lackings, perhaps because of them, Ralph Nader sent an emotional spark throughout the audience that no news story will every be able to capture.

The reason for this is that a news story can tell you what he said, when and where he said it, and give estimates concerning crowd sizes and reactions. A news story can never adequately explain the charge that goes through a room when Nader speaks. I've heard Ralph Nader speak two or three times in person, and each time I was struck by a sort of "awkward nobility" about the man. In the past he seemed to "recite" his prepared text; most of the time staring down at the podium. The first time I heard him, I felt like I was hearing a mystic, a prophet, a great man, but I didn't feel that he was comfortable in his role. It was as if he were giving lectures to inform people and rally them (both times I heard him he was trying to rally financial and emotional support behind the forming Public Interest Research Groups in the country) to the cause of consumer rights.

However yesterday all this seemed changed. Nader kept consistant eye contact with his audience, and after ten minutes he seemed to abandon his prepared text. Nader seemed as at ease with his audience as he did with his subject, and spoke with energy, intelligence and feeling for over an hour. He answered questions directly, never contradicted himself, and told things with emphasis that are too often shunted to the back pages of newspapers.

Nader spoke of the "partnership" between oil companies, and how they have continually conspired against the public while consistantly avoiding any real competition between themsleves. "How can Siamese twins conspire against each other?" he pointed out at one point with a dry grin. Accusing the big oil companies of trying to monopolize every viable energy source he concluded "the only thing that has yet defied them is the sun..and that is only because the sun has not yet given out the secret on ways to harness its energy."

Ralph Nader saved his sharpest attacks on the planning of nuclear power plants and predicted bluntly that it is, "the beginning of the end of the United States, unless we stop (building them)..it is just that simple!"

This is all I will say about the "factual" information concerning Nader's visit. If you are interested in more, take a look at the news story. The point is that when Ralph Nader spoke most of the people in the audience seemed truly moved; they seemed to feel that there are things that must be done, and Nader seems to inspire confidence that they can be done. It isn't simply that Nader is a very convincing speaker (although he is), but rather that Nader seems so devoted to his truth that he lives it "everyday" without contradiction. While many people make a great deal of money for themselves, even though the cause them might be pushing is noble, this is not the case with Nader. Despite the fact that he generates over one million dollars of "profit" each year (writing, speaking, etc) he keeps the percentage of that (probably less than $15,000 a year) for himself.

A few years ago, when he launched his muckraking investigation of the Auto Industry in Detroit, General Motors tried to discredit Nader by investigating him. What did they find? Well he wasn't a communist, homosexual, womanizer, cheater, wife beater (why he wasn't even married), or thief. Ah, he wasn't really an American they were forced to conclude, and after documenting his spartan existence extensively they accused him of being an "eccentric."

But Ralph Nader defies that classification as well as most others. "I'm not a Democrat, Conservative, Liberal, or Republican" he concluded, "I just believe in self-government." And when it was over, Nader was given a standing ovation. The man who had touched so many that day, in fact seemed touched himself. But he couldn't savor it. It wouldn't last. No sooner had the applause started to subside, then he was hustled off the stage by one of his hosts. Ralph Nader quickly covered his shoulders with a morose black raincoat...and as he walked out I felt something indiscribable for him.. that man the Spartan, Citizen Nader.

Why Nixon can't quit

(UPS) President Nixon has announced for the 1,008th time this week that he is not, much less thinking about, resigning from the office of the Presidency. Mr. Nixon has held this office since 1969, although an independent poll has concluded that many Americans refuse to believe that such a person could exist in the democracy of a free republic.

Mr. Nixon, who spoke before the capacity crowd of six people and two German schnauzers in the East Wing lavoratory of the White House, who were gathered for the new national holiday celebrating the President's wife's 62nd birthday.

"From now on," said the President, "Let this day be known as St. Pat's day."

"On this momentous occasion," continued the President, "Let me make one thing perfectly clear. To resign or not to resign is not the question. The question of resignation should not exist in a democracy. As you know, there is presently a bill before the Congress which would eliminate all members of any judiciary committee who would allow such a committee (of impeaching the president) to exist. As you might expect, I believe this bill will pass through the Congress unanimously, or else those who do chose to vote against it will find other employment opportunities in our country's services. Like the Department of Sanitation Engineering in the Bowery."

A smiling Secretary of State Henry Kissinger wheeled in the 62 foot wide, U.S. Mint green birthday cake decorated with a Chinese panda bear sitting atop an oil derrick as the President spoke.

An unidentified man wearing an "I Like Ike" tie clip asked Mr. Nixon just what his plans were for the next two years.

"Let me say this about that," said Mr. Nixon, "I was voted into this office by the people of this glorious country. A people who voted me with confidence and trust, and let me just add this. In the remaining two years of my term I will try, to the best of my ability to screw, I mean continue as I see fitting of the office that I now hold."

Vice-President Gerald Ford then asked the President, "Why don't you just go and quit."

"Quit?" remarked the President. "I find that last statement most absurd. I have two years left in which to serve my country. If I were to quit now, it would be most harmful for the economic stability of the President. As you all know, in two years Pat will be 64 years old, an age in which is considered eligible for Social Security benefits. If I were to resign today, my family would have no source of income until two years from now. That is why I choose to remain in office. Do you people have any idea of what it costs to keep up an estate in southern California, not to mention the domestics in Florida. No, I think it would be best for me to serve out my entire term."

Concluding his speech, the President added, "O.K. Pat, you can cut the cake now."

Primitive new ideas

By LUIS MANUEL MEDINA

The successful advancement of technology could keep increasing through studying the ideas of non-technical cultures. Different countries such as the U.S.A., England and U.S.S.R., among others, have research groups studying non-technical cultures. Will they find something in terms of new machines to resolve today's world problems? Seems to be that certainly we will have more and more technical devices based on what we have considered ideas and concepts of "primitive" people.

Inventions have been based in examples of the natural environment that surrounds humankind, such as the flying machines, radar, atomic energy, etc., which are based respectively in birds, bats and the sun. Leonardo Da Vinci sketched different machines and Jules Verne wrote science fiction stories, centuries and decades ago respectively, that have become a reality. Ideas and concepts that have remained as non-scientific could become, with the help of modern technology, a reality, too.

Besides the opposition of a few people, most of humankind beLieves that the development of technology is the answer to most of the problems that humanity is facing. The successful solution to them could maintain the stability of the world. But, how can humanity find those solutions, if most of the answers such as transportation are facing problems? Many of today's answers will be not good tomorrow. New solutions must be found, and approaches to those solutions need new perspectives.

The so called "primitive" cultures, and ancients cultures as well as under-developed countries, are a great source of potential for new and innovative uses of technology. Those ideas are based on popular and folkloric believes mostly from non-technical words; Americans, British and Russians are researching and investigating some of those ideas.

Will they find new ideas that could consider it useful? Certainly yes, because the greater creativity of humankind, the better resources that scientists have today; and because not all the history of ancient cultures is available. The Aztecs, for example, developed many techniques, and made scientific discoveries, that in many ways were better than the ones we have today. The solar year was more accurate and precise than the system that we use today. What techniques did they use? Many of them are lost because the Spanish 'conquistadores' destroyed much scientific information while conquering the Aztec Empire. How many other wars, disasters, etc., have destroyed scientific discoveries and accomplishments of different cultures that should have been part of humanity's heritage?

Used well technology can be humanity's best friend, but to be orientated more towards the social sciences. Besides all the new problems that every answer brings, it is also a new answer. It is obvious that overpopulation, housing, education, job and agricultural problems, must be resolved through the use of technology. New approaches too, and a new perspective of technology should be taken from the non-technical world.

Save Russel Daniels

To The Editor:

Once in a great while a court case or the plight of an individual gets into the news. Sacco and Vanzetti weren't able to make it but today we have the chance to save one man from "blind justice".

Russell Daniels is black, mentally retarded and behind bars for life at Walpole unless someone helps him. Russell, although illiterate, signed a confession and that according to the Real Paper was just about all the state used conclusively to prove that Russell was guilty of murdering an old woman in Springfield. I hope that all the information wasn't presented in the Real Paper because I can't believe that so many people are responsible for such a blatant railroad job. It's about time that the shoddy rehabilitation in our mental institutions turn out one lucky success after all the failures. Russell got out of Belchertown and a halfway house. but if the police are going to use these people as scapegoats for crimes then the programs are useless to everyone.

Let's push and get the truth out and hopefully Russell Daniels too!

Dlugosz: generalizing

To The Editor:

I am writing this as a response in kind to Miss Carol Schieb's letter published in Thursday's Collegian, which in itself was a response to an earlier published letter from Mark Dlugosz, who offered his opinion about the dating situation at UMass.

I agreed with most of what Miss Schieb had to say. Like her, I felt that Mr. Dlugosz was generaliizing erroneously about a situation about which he manifestly knows little.

However, I feel that Miss Schieb went on to make the same mistake that she accused Mr. Dlugosz of making — generalization. She stated that she knew many women who would like to date but who would find it awkward to ask men out. She then said, "A man wouldn't know how to handle this situation anyways because his domineering role would be threatened."

I don't know where Miss Schieb gets the insight to generalize any more than Mr. Dlugosz did. I'm not even sure what a "domineering role" is, but I do know that whatever it is, it is a quality whose existence or lack thereof is a highly personal matter.

Personally, I would not feel the least bit threatened if Miss Schieb or any other woman asked me for a date. It would be a very novel and interesting departure from the usual dating customs.

Harrington responds

Dear Michael, Tracy and Joseph:

This is in response to your statement in the campus newspaper on March 13, 1974 regarding my open letter to Representative Ralph E. Sirianni, Jr. I compliment you on your interest in the legislative process, for in times such as these such interest on the part of the electorate is a necessity and should be complimented.

I do recognize the right of a legislator to testify at Committee Hearings before other witnesses because of their pressing legislative schedules, but, at the time of the Committee on Public Safety's hearings on gun control on February 25, 1974, George Sacco was no longer a Representative and had no such schedule. Contrary to your statement, I was present at the hearing but was not recognized to testify by Representative Sirianni. As the former head of the United States Department of Justice's Organized Crime Strike Force for New England, I would have thought that my background in law and in law enforcement might have provided some information of value on this most vital public issue.

If you would desire to hear my views on this or any other issue in relation to Mr. Sacco's, I suggest that you organize a forum at the University of Massachusetts where both of us would be able to ventilate our ideas on the significant issues of this campaign.

Ted Harrington

Investigate RSO groups

To The Editor:

As a student who has watched with dismay the recent uncoverings of scandal in our government, I am further dismayed to hear of a similar incident involving mishandling and misappropriation of Collegian funds.

I refer to the recent resignation of the Advertising Manager of the Collegian. He resigned in the wake of his discovery of some bookkeeping "errors" of the type that are usually placed in the category of embezzlement.

Unable to muster enough support among his co-workers to oust the party in question even by vote, he resigned.

Once I felt, idealistically as perhaps every generation does, that my particular generation was the hope of the world. Doesn't look, in the light of an incident like this, involving 21-year-old college students, as if we're off to a very good start. I have or at least had another strange idea — that intelligent people can and do distinguish between right and wrong. It disturbs me to think that perhaps to future generations this idea will have to become their unattainable ideal instead of a universally accepted axiom.

The Collegian is funded, at least in part, by student funds. It is beyond my ability to see the reasoning behind or the justification for the use of these funds for personal gain by the Collegian employee (s?)

Wouldn't the same thing be accomplished by strolling through the Union picking pockets? Those pockets are the very same pockets the Collegian monies come from — fellow students and friends.

The Boltwood-Belchertown Project has lost its funding. This means not only no more activities for the inmates but no more buses to bring them the time and love the students involved have to offer.

Perhaps we should recheck a few budgets and books and see whether the "extra" money that seems to be floating around the Collegian (and perhaps other student-run activities) and into various pockets couldn't be reallocated in hopes of reaching a more beneficent end.

With the chance to see Ralph Nader speak in person, a standing room only crowd jammed the Student Union Ballroom yesterday afternoon. Nader addressed the audience for 45 minutes followed by a 15 minute question and answer period. His major topic was the potential disasters that could result from nuclear power plants and the efforts to make the public concerned enough to force the government to halt its operation of all nuclear power plants.

Nader hits petroleum industry

He spoke of the "classic form of oligopoly" that exists between the major oil companies and their desire to control all energy, in an attempt to "hold off the market, a potentially price depressing form of energy."

Nader cited their interest in geothermal energy as one example: "Oil companies control 30 per cent of the coal output in this country and about 50 per cent of the uranium milling. The only thing that has yet defied them in the sun."

He was also critical of William Simon and his Federal Energy Office for not operating in the best interests of the consumer: The FEO has 52 former oil industry employees making policy. What you have is an office that sponsors and condones the doubling of the price of energy."

During the question and answer period, a student asked Nader about the proposed nuclear power plant to be built in Montague: It's similar to many others around the country--it's been repeatedly condemned."

The probable damage from a melt down in a nuclear power plant reactor would be 45,000 immediate fatalities, 100,000 serious injuries, An area of contamination equal to the size of Pennsylvania, and at least 17 billion dollars in damage.

These figures were taken from an Atomic Energy Commission report of 1965 which was suppressed until 1973.

"It's ingenuous for the Federal Government to tell us there's a one in a million chance of a nuclear accident, when no insurance company will insure a nuclear power plant for more than a fraction of 1 per cent of its probably damage."

The speech was sponsored by the Campus Coalition for Environmental Quality, the Institute for Man and His Environment, and the University and State Communications Council.

Gas credit card abuse cited for state employees

BOSTON (AP) - Legislative investigators will report this week that one state car allegedly used 699 gallons of gasoline to go 202 miles, while another was charged with 381 gallons for a month it was out of service.

These two examples from the Department of Public Works are part of what the Committee on Post Audit says it widespread abuse of gasoline credit cards issued to state employes.

One DPW vehicle supposedly was serviced 144 times in a month, at the rate of six visits per day to a particular South Shore gasoline station. The bill that month was $1,171, which triggered a protest from the department's computer.

The investigators discovered that the DPW computer was programmed to call attention to any monthly total of $1,000 or more on any credit card.

The DPW launched its own investigation of expenditures from the credit card that went over the top. According to the probers, however, the unidentified state employes involved said they did nothing wrong and there has been no disciplinary action.

However, the state has refused to pay approximately $23,000 in bills incurred by the department for the period investigated by the DPW. The legislative probers reported this billing dispute remains "unresolved."

Officials at the DPW, the committee investigation has indicated, contemplated criminal action for fraud but this apparently was dropped in favor of recouping some losses by not paying questionable bills.

The DPW owns half the commonwealth's 6,600 vehicles. At one point, there were more than 14,000 gasoline credit cards held by state employes. This number has recently been drastically reduced.

Massachusetts spent $1.35 million for gasoline through credit cards in fiscal 1973 and another $955,000 in bulk purchases. In addition, an undetermined amount of money went to individuals using private vehicles on public business, as a mileage reimbursement.

The investigators noted the numerous efforts in past years to get a handle on the problem and have commended Administration Secretary William I. Cowin for inaugurating controls which are just now getting underway.

Among problems cited were regulations separating many vehicles from available bulk supplies that are as much as 14 cents per gallon cheaper. The probers found that administrators of the Department of Public Health must use credit cards and are denied access to bulk supplies at DPH facilities.

The Department of Public Safety mostly the state police received commendations for taking 90 per cent of its gasoline from bulk supplies although now all its employes have credit cards for emergencies.

Committee for Human Rights in Soviet area appeals to community

Open letter to members of Congress

Dear Congressman:

The undersigned members of the campus community at the University of Massachusetts in Amherst wish to draw your attention to the following statement, prepared by the local Committee for Human Rights in the Soviet Area, which they endorse.

IS ABSTRACT SYMPATHY THE ONLY RESPONSE WE ARE PERMITTED with respect to Soviet dissidents, emigration rights for Soviet Jews, and the general plight of people living under totalitarian regimes in the Soviet area? Officials in charge of United States foreign policy seem to say as much: The humanitarian concerns, though praiseworthy, must remain sterile, lest they interfere with the cold calculations of the politics of detente.

Why should that be so? Is it really in our interest? Considering that these "cold calculations" seem to have resulted mainly in one-sided concessions to the Soviet Union, they should be subjected to close scrutiny. It is possible, for instance, that the administration takes this stand -- as it does in the case of the Trade Reform Bill -- because it feels under pressure to fulfill its end of some sort of understanding reached perhaps in connection with the end of open warfare in Vietnam. On the other hand, the notion that concern with conditions in the Soviet Union conflicts with rational policy making may be simply due to a failure to perceive clearly the implications of Soviet domestic conditions and of the struggle of Soviet dissidents for the long-term interests of the United States. This is the issue we want to explore.

WE BELIEVE THAT IT IS WRONG AS WELL AS DANGEROUS to leave the state of the Soviet domestic regime out of our assessment of international power relations. At the basis of United States policy is the search for a stable peace. The totalitarian nature of the Soviet internal regime affects this policy both indirectly and directly. Therefore, we are concerned that the case of Soviet dissidents and related issues not be treated only as isolated matters of moral concern with endangered individuals. They should be seen in the full context of Soviet totalitarian controls, and of what they mean for the preservation of peace.

THE GREATEST DANGER LIES, TO OUR THINKING, IN THE AREA OF COMMUNICATIONS. We are unable to tell the Soviet people about our own intentions. They are unable to find out for themselves what the world is like outside their country. They are also unable to communicate freely with each other, and with their writers and thinkers, to find out about the true state of their country and their own potentialities for change. Between them, and us, as well as between one Soviet citizen and another, there stands the regime's near-absolute monopoly of information.

THE PURPOSE TO WHICH THIS INFORMATION MONOPOLY IS PUT is the creation of myths bolstering and sustaining the totalitarian regime. To justify its existence and rigor, the regime needs to keep alive the image of an external enemy. At the same time, it also needs to keep up the image of a Western world of cruel poverty and injustice on the brink of imminent economic and social collapse. ("Can black people in the U.S. own cars?" was one typical question addressed recently to an American.) The falseness of the image of a threatening West is clear to anyone who knows about prevailing Western attitudes toward military budgets and economic assistance to the Soviet Union. However, internally, it helps the regime to exploit the profound emotions of patriotism for the loyalty of its subjects, and support of its military machine and expansionist stratagems.

Therefore, TO PRESERVE OUR OWN SECURITY and be able to divert the world's resources to more productive ends than armaments, WE NEED TO MAKE THE ELIMINATION OF THE SOVIET MONOPOLY OF INFORMATION A PRIORITY POLICY OBJECTIVE. Only if the Soviet people learn the truth will they be able to activate their own social energies and put their rulers under the constraint of their opinion and will, as we do ours. Only then will our negotiated agreements have a solid basis, instead of being subject to the risks of arbitrary changes of mind or hidden intentions of uncontrolled leaders.

DO WE HAVE THE PRACTICAL MEANS to influence the course of events in that direction? Definitely yes. We are convinced that our communications technology is sufficiently advanced, or can be developed, to penetrate the regime's information monopoly on a more effective scale than has been the case so far. Furthermore, with some degree of imagination, it should be possible to tie our various economic and other concessions effectively to concrete Soviet counter-concessions that would provide for a free and unrestricted travel of people in both directions, and for a free flow of information. While some may object to this as interference in Soviet domestic affairs, we believe that it is a legitimate interference in Soviet domestic affairs, we believe that it is a legitimate interference since it promotes world peace as well as human rights.

Unless the connection between the domestic regime of the Soviet Union and our security is clearly understood, the warnings addressed to us by Andrei Sakharov, the dissident Soviet physicist and perceptive political anayst, will have been in vain:

> "Dentente without democratization, detente in which the West in effect accepts the Soviet rules of the game, would be dangerous. It would not really solve any of the world's problems and would simply mean capitulating in the face of real or exaggerated soviet power...As a result, the world would become helpless before this uncontrolled bureaucratic machine. It would pose a serious threat to the world as a whole."

WE COUNT ON YOU TO USE THE INFLUENCE OF YOUR OFFICE TO COUNTER THESE DANGERS BY PRACTICAL POLITICAL AND LEGISLATIVE MEASURES. In this instance, our traditional sense of decency and human solidarity goes hand in hand with our most selfish interest in peace and security. And even though tangible results may not be within immediate reach, they are of such vital importance to use that they ought to be pursued steadily, consistently, and relentlessly until they are reached.

Thank you.

Personal appeal to UMass

Dear Friend:

In the many memoirs written by former inmates of Soviet forced labor camps who reached safety in the West, one theme comes up again and again. Those who stayed behind, plead with the lucky ones: "Please, do not forget -- do not forget to tell the West!" Evidently, they hoped fervently for some kind of help from the people in free countries, once their story became known.

Most of the escapees did not forget, and did tell the West. However, the Western public generally reacted with helpless embarrassment: "What can we do?" Then, in the late 'fifties and 'sixties, when the horrible system of forced labor camps was reduced in scope, the urgency of such help seemed to diminish. It was hoped that the totalitarian regime would become progressively more liberal all by itself. People did not realize that the regime would try to reorganize its controls, make them more subtle and more efficient, and enlist the deep feelings of Russian patriotism for its own purposes. Thus, the Soviet regime became actually stronger and more dangerous to the rest of the world.

Now, a new wave of appeals from Soviet citizens has been reaching the West, with new desperate pleas for help. This time, a new note is added: It is not their own plight alone which moves them, but also their anguish concerning the dangers to world peace posed by the increased power of the Soviet regime.

This time, we ought to respond. A group of members of the campus community have joined as individuals, to form a Committee for Human Rights in the Soviet Area with that purpose in mind. They are determined to try to disprove the notion that Americans are helpless and must watch passively what is happening to people in the Soviet area and what this development does in the long run to our own security.

The members of the Committee are, of course, just as concerned with oppression under authoritarian regimes in other parts of the globe. On humanitarian grounds, they all have an equal claim to our attention. We chose to concentrate on the Soviet area because of a special political priority, since the Soviet regime deeply affects the rest of the world and its security.

As a first step, the founding group of the Committee has prepared a statement of the issues to be sent as an open letter to all members of the U.S. Congress, and to be published as a paid advertisement in The Daily Collegian, and possibly in other papers.

We ask you to support that statement (see enclosed sheet) by attaching your signature on the rider below, and to send a financial contribution to defray the cost of the advertisement and expenses connected with printing, mailing, distribution, and further activities aimed at wider dissemination of our message.

If you think Kodak is just pretty pictures, you ought to have your chest examined.

When a chest x-ray shows that you have a potential killer like TB or cancer, it's not a pretty picture. But it's an important picture because it can help the doctor detect and catch the killer in time.

When doctors are out to catch these potential killers, they want the sharpest, clearest x-ray films they can get. And that's why people at Kodak spend so many hours creating new and better x-ray film equipment. Already, the results include convenience for the patient, economy for the hospital, an even more useful tool for the radiologist—and, most important, reduced radiation exposure.

Researching and creating better x-ray films is good for our business, which is why we went into them in the first place. But it does our society good, too—which isn't a bad feeling. After all, our business depends on our society—so we care what happens to it.

Kodak
More than a business.

Dear Aggie

Keepin' the pigeon toed

Dear UMies,

I was sent this letter last week and for lack of anything better to write I am telling you of my response, because it involves a little bit more than just a letter. Here it is.

Dear Aggie,

I'm a homing pigeon who unfortunately has lost his way. I'm carrying information vital to the success of the Revolution and it's imperative that it be delivered to my contact in Fall River. As I write for help I'm perched on the window sill of Apt. — at — Brittany Manor and due to a critical lack of food and provisions I'm too weak to fly. The residents of the apartment have been as helpful as they can but I'm afraid they don't have any food either. They just lie around all day, sort of glossy-eyed, and ask each other where they are, so I guess they're lost too. I'm too weak to beg but if food and directions could be delivered to that address you would be contributing greatly to the Revolution. Please Help!!

Homer

Dear Homer,

Help is on the way. I have already sent a package of Junior Mints to the address as stated with a choice of two ways to get to Fall River, either by Route 2 or the Mass. Pike. Hey, do pidgeons eat Junior Mints? And what's a revolution anyway? In any case, I hope I helped. If I can be of any more assistance, please don't be shy to ask — if you survive your most urgent mission.

And, one more question. Homer, my fine feathered friend, what do pidgeons write with — a pen, a pencil, or a magic marker? Just curiosity, you understand.

And now for a bit of poetry:

I eat my peas honey
I've done it all my life
It makes the peas taste funny
But it keeps them on the knife.

Wind ensemble to perform Afro-American work

An evening of wind music will be presented by the UMass Wind Ensemble tonight at 8:00 p.m. The concert is in Bowker Auditorium and is free of charge.

The ensemble, consisting of 57 students from all schools in the University, is conducted by Professor John Jenkins, Director of Bands. Joe Duchi, Assistant Professor of Music, is Assistant Conductor.

The program includes music of many forms. Two symphonies are included; Vittorio Giannini's "Symphony No. 3", and Alan Hovhaness' "Symphony No. 4". "Folk Song Suite" by Ralph Vaugn Williams and "The Pride of the Wolverines" by John Philip Sousa cap off the program.

The Wind Ensemble is featuring Gerry Bilik's "They Walked in Darkness." The piece was commissioned by Harold Arnoldi and the Wayne State University Band for the radio series "The Band Played On", with text by Mike Whorf and supplementary material by Gilbert Maddox. It is an attempt to portray by words and music, the history and depth of American Black Culture. This marks the first time in the band's history, that a contemporary Afro-American piece is part of its repertoire.

Horace Clarence Boyer, Assistant Professor of Music.

YSA forum

Debby Bustin and Don Gurewitz will be the speakers at the second forum of the YSA's continuous forum series tonight at 8 p.m. in Rm. 164 SU. Energy crisis and Watergate: How to Fight Back will present an overall revolutionary Socialist perspective of these events as manifestations of the crisis in American capitalism, along with the program for a Socialist alternative.

Don Gurewitz was the Socialist Workers Party candidate for U.S. Senate in 1972, a campaign which was very successful. He is currently running for Governor of Massachusetts, and has been well received by audiences at UMass in the past.

Debby Bustin is a National Committee member of the Young Socialist Alliance, and holds the dubious honor of being on Nixon's secret enemies list. She is currently working with the Political Rights Defense Fund, a group exposing and attacking the governments years of illegal harassmnt and persecution of the left.

Woman's workshop

A Woman's Career Awareness Workshop for undergraduate and graduate students is being offered this spring by two staff members of the Student Development Center, S. Krivatsy and E. Kennedy. Its purpose is to help women plan the career direction they wish their lives to take. Personal exploration, the expression of individual interests and abilities through activities and discussion, and career goal-setting will be the main focus of the workshop series. Interviewing, individual investigation of specific occupations, and resume writing may also be a part of the series, dependent on participants' interests and needs.

The workshop series will begin Monday morning, April 8, 9:30-11:00 a.m., and run for six sessions, through May 13, 1974. You may sign up for the Woman's Career Awareness Workshop or learn more about it by calling the SDC, 545-0333. The deadline for registering is Friday, March 22 in Room 213, Berkshire House. Watch for additional information in the Collegian.

Global studies

Issues of world concern will be approached by a new UMass program reaching out to a variety of organizations in the State.

The Global Studies Program, which this year has been offering 55 UMass freshmen a special program on world issues, will soon work with labor, business, education, religious, and other groups in a cooperative effort to give more people "global literacy."

Program Director David Schimmel says the Program "will provide information on the five global problems, so people can make intelligent and informed decisions on matters which will affect us all."

The five areas are: economic development and environmental deterioration, population, peace and war, resource distribution and depletion, and cross-cultural conflict and communication.

Groups and individuals may obtain additional information from Prof. David Schimmel, Global Survival Studies, Wysocki House. April 15 is the deadline for groups to register for participation.

Vets help vets

As of April 1973, there were some 120,000 veterans in the State of Massachusetts who had not used their G.I. educational benefits.

The Veterans Affairs Office needs help in contacting these veterans. If there are any veterans who are in a dead-end job or in the unemployment lines with no prospect for the future, they can still go to school and get an education while being paid for it.

An information table will be set up in the Student Union and SBA today Wednesday, and Thursday of this week to hand out Outreach packets to any interested students.

Psychology workshop

A workshop on "Psychological Aspects affecting Third World Women in the Caribean" will be given tonight at 8 p.m. in Room 623 of Tobin Hall by Dr. Johnetta Cole of the W.E.B. Dubois Afro-American Studies and Anthropology Dept. at UMass and Dr. Gloria Joseph of the Psychology Dept. of Hampshire College. The workshop is sponsored by the Black Student Psychological Association. Refreshments will be served.

Biochem seminar

Dr. Henry Hagedorn of the UMass Dept. of Entomology will be speaking on the "Control of Yolk Protein Synthesis in the Mosquitoe" this afternoon at 4 p.m. in Rm. 203 of the Graduate Research Center Tower. All are welcome and coffee will be served.

Dr. Mead's morals

Describing Watergate as "a final expression of contempt for law at the very top," Dr. Margaret Mead today called for a "moral renaissance" and argued that impeachment would be "fair" to the President.

"What is uncertain is whether there is enough faith in the rule of law in this country, where almost everyone cheats all the time," Dr. Mead said in a copyrighted article for the current (April) issue of Redbook.

"If Americans finally come face to face with this (the seriousness of Watergate), it may have the same beneficial effect as treating a boil by lancing it at the top," the noted anthropologist declared.

"Impeachment is fair to the President," Dr. Mead said. "The people of the United States need to understand that impeachment is not the same as a conviction, not a way to automatically throw the President out of office.

"To impeach is simply to bring an accusation or accusations against a public official, and this if followed by a fair trial. Impeachment of a President means that you are trying the highest officer in the land in the only court where the Constitution says he should be tried."

One of several women leaders interviewed by Redbook who called for an end to the scandals that began with Watergate, Dr. Mead conteded, "We need to bring our practices into a somewhat closer fit with our professed ideals on which a moral renaissance could rest."

Gregory Battcock, nationally known art editor and author, will be speaking on "New Tendencies in Art" in Room 231 of Herter Hall today from 4-5 p.m. Battcock, who is currently the editor of "Arts Magazine", has edited several anthologies including: New Ideas in Art Education, The New Art, Idea Art, New American Cinema, and The New Music.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

When Venus makes a trine or sextile aspect to Neptune, you can purchase clothing which will have an aura of glamor. If you are looking for something progressive, eccentric or "different," choose a day when Venus is making a favorable aspect to Uranus.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Emphasis is on winning friends, influencing people and gaining through professional endeavors. Progress is key, along with profit and added responsibility. Affairs of heart dominate, too. Means you are busy on two fronts: emotional and business.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You conclude efforts which lead to assignment, recognition, added prestige. Aries, Libra persons could figure prominently. You are tested, challenged. You are "called in" for conference with professional superior.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Good lunar aspect coincides now with publishing, stimulation of learning process, travel, communication. Creative resources come surging to forefront. You perceive potential. You see beyond the immediate--and you deal with Leo and Aquarius persons.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): What happens now seems to come in pairs. Nothing occurs in one-sided manner, it is double--two persons involved--and repeating. It is best to wait for other shoe to fall. Aquarian and Leo seem, somehow, to put puzzle pieces together. Ask them questions!

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): If you are not positive, wait. Time now is on your side. Contract offer will be made--don't jump at it. Listen and observe. One who is at a distance could be wooing you by telephone. Insist on additional facts, figures.

VIRGO (Aug 23-Sept. 22): Study Leo message. Maintain steady pace. Avoid excess. Find unobstrusive way of rewarding one who performs special service. Check details. Thorough approach pays dividends. Know it and proceed in orderly manner. Intricate proposal requires time to "digest."

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Excitement is featured and could involve opposite

Personal magnetism draws many persons to you. You can put across views in dynamic fashion. Gemini, Virgo persons figure in important ways. Young persons express interest in your concept.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Rigidity is not an ally. Flexibility can be an asset. Applies especially in realm of family affairs. Domestic adjustment is on agenda. Know it and don't attempt to fight progress. Money, budget is to be considered, reviewed and revised.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Accent is on how you relate to neighbors, travel suggestions and off-the-cuff ideas. Think on your feet. Display versatility. Operate with material at hand. Relative makes request which could be based on wishful thinking.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Accept offer which adds to bank account. Take cash and let credit go--seize chance to improve financial status. Overtime assignment works in your favor. Member of opposite sex is drawn to you in meaningful manner.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Make new starts in new directions. Emphasize greater independence, originality. Wear bright colors. Be conspicuous. Cycle is high and your judgment, intuition are on target. You will be able to reach more persons in meaningful manner.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): You are able to gain access to privileged information. Utilize added knowledge in creative fashion. Imprint your own style. Study Aquarius message. Frank, direct approach gains plaudits. One who makes veiled threats is bluffing.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BRITHDAY you are independent, creative, appreciate art objects and you will have financial windfall in October. Relationship which appears on the rocks may be merely undergoing emotional second wind. You draw many persons to you born under Leo and Aquarius. You are attrative to opposite sex and romance is as essential to you as food and water is to most persons.

Summer jobs in Britain

College and university students will be able to obtain permission to work in Great Britain this coming summer through the Summer Jobs in Britain program sponsored in the U.S. by the Council on International Educational Exchange. CIEE, which has been active in all aspects of student travel for over 25 years, is able to eliminate the extensive red tape usually involved in obtaining working papers.

Because of the common language, Britain has always been the most popular country for American students who wish to work abroad. And because of the increased prices for transatlantic transportation and living expenses abroad, working may be the only way for some students to visit Europe this year.

The fee for Summer Jobs in Britain is $15; students may get full details and application forms from CIEE, Department BSC, 777 United Nations Plaza, New York, New York 10017.

Atmosphere of time

Suddenly...the unmistakable realization of the aura of Time.

With the basketball dropping for the opening tapoff as fleetingly as a grain of sand through an hourglass, it became apparent that the subsequent events to transpire would determine the value of the Past as well as shape the fortune of the Future.

So, Jacksonville and Massachusetts performed — at times not very well — in a tournament game of passing interest to outsiders, much interest to insiders, and monumental interest to those immediately involved.

For it was the immediately involved, the players, whose lives would be move effected by what happened in the next two hours under the decorative plumbob and sagging ceiling of Madison Square Garden.

Butch Taylor dominated. Al Skinner was just slightly more than ineffectual. John Murphy scored a lot of points, but muffed a lot of passes. Henry Williams played forward like he invented the position. Peter Trow rose to the occasion.

...And throughout all the action — a pervading awareness of Time...the computerstyle digits ticking away the 40 minutes with UMass behind...-the knowledge that the minutes may be running out on the basketball careers of Minutemen Rick Pitino, Trow, and John Olson or Dolphins Leon Benbow, Ted Wisnewski, and George Scholz...the drifting smoke in the mezzanines like the mists of time...

The game was ruled by the Chronos Trinity — the infinite Past and Future, combined with the all-too-finite Present.

The players' uncountable hours of practice in the Past and immeasurable urge to go on to Future tourney games resulted in their somewhat sloppy Present.

Both teams, in their urge to win, got a little over-anxious, and it resulted in a total of forty-two turnovers. Fittingly, when regulation time ended, neither team was assured of moving on in the NIT.

The scoreboard's orange numbers read: 0:00. But the UMass fans were cheering. The Minutemen had tied the game and earned a second chance. Five minutes of overtime to justify the laborious Past. 300 seconds to create a brighter Future.

The Dolphins score the first two points. Then, their attack sputters again. But UMass sputters worse.

For the trailing Minutemen, the digits flashing down toward zero take on a melancholic, if not morose, air. With less than a minute left, Benbow is fouled.

Benbow puts in two, and shortly thereafter forces a jump ball.

With eight seconds to go, Williams has the ball, Jacksonville the lead, and UMass the realization of their fate.

Then, again the scoreboard clock is at 0:00, but this time there is no noise whatsoever. Few Dolphin followers are present.

Minuteman championship hopes for the Future, so lively a minute ago, are now dead, as much a part of the Past as Naismith. Flickering matches, like red grave markers in the night, light up post-game cigarettes.

The crowd sits in stunned silence as Leaman and Co. start to disappear into the bowels of the Garden...and for some, into Oblivion...

As the last players exit, an unexpected roar swells.

The applause was not just for the excellent season, nor was it just for the exciting game. And it wasn't just a tribute to the players who will never pass this way again...

...It was for all three...the Past, the Present, and the Future...

Swimmers end season in record fashion

"Swimming today is 90 per cent practice and endurance and only about 10 per cent talent."

—Men's swim coach Bey Melamed

"Coach Melamed worked us harder than we've ever been worked before."

—Co-captain Dick Blaisdell

By BOB HIGGINS

"Swimming today is 90 per cent practice and endurance and only about 10 per cent talent."

Men's swim coach Bey Melamed

"Coach Melamed worked us harder than we've ever been worked before."

Co-captain Dick Blaisdell

These two quotes offer the best explanation for the success of the men's swim team this season. After a few disastrous seasons (1-10 last year), the hard work this year paid off as the Minutemen swimmers compiled a respectable record of 6-7, and broke the majority of the school records in the process.

And to top it off, six new UMass records were set in the New England Championships last week at Brown. The 800-yard freestyle relay team of Joe Hebert, Duncan Lomas, Ron Boucher, and Ben Crooker finished eighth with a record time of 7:39.9. Crooker himself set three records; the 1650-yard freestyle (18:05.3), the 1000-yard freestyle (10:56.2, en route to the 1650 record), and the 500-yard freestyle (5:07.5). Joe Hebert broke the 200-yard freestyle record in 1:55.2, and Dave Boucher set the 100-yard breastroke record in 1:05.2. Plus, the 400-yard freestyle relay team of Lomas, Boucher, Hebert, and Dick Blaisdell set a record of 3:26.7.

The difference was the work of the coach, Bey Melamed. He dedicated a lot of time to individuals, helping them with style and endurance. As the year, went on, times began to improve and the team became closer.

"We became more of a team rather than a bunch of individuals," said Melamed.

Melamed also gave a lot of credit to his assistant, Larry Lammert. Lammert, a former swimmer at Indiana, volunteered his time to the team this year, and Melamed credits him with much of the team's success.

As for the future, the coach was enthusiastic. "The team needs some help in quite a few areas, but generally we're strong," he stated. Only two swimmers will be graduating this year (co-captains George Kwiecien and Dick Blaisdell), so the next few years should be quite good. However, with regards to recruiting, Melamed said, "We have little to offer any swimmer who is looking for a big-name school. It's going to take a while to put UMass back on the New England swimming map."

One area that Melamed need not worry about is the longdistance swimming events, where Ben "Iron Man" Crooker is one of the best in New England. "He still hasn't developed to his full potential, and he needs more strength," said Melamed. The untrained viewer would never know it by watching Crooker shatter the old UMass records in the 500-and 1000-yard freestyles.

The only thing that disappointed Melamed was that the team did not finish with a winning record. Although the difference is minimal, especially in a sport like swimming, Melamed would have liked 7-6 a lot more than 6-7. Yet the latter is still a respectable mark, and hopefully only the first step in putting UMass "back on the New England swimming map."

Fusia deserves credit for beginning football program

By RICH SEVIERI

When UMass lured Vic Fusia away from Pittsburgh in 1960, it marked the beginning of a decade of football excellence unequalled in the university's history.

Fusia took over a football program that had failed to produce back to back winning seasons since 1934-35, and moulded it into the class of the Yankee Conference within 3 years.

From 1963 through '69 Fusia's teams dominated the conference, winning 4 out of 5 titles, and compiling a 22-3 interconference record. Stingy defenses, and outstanding quarterbacks were the trademarks of those teams.

John McCormack, the signal-caller from 60-62 was the first Redman ever drafted by the NFL. After a short stay with Minnesota he hooked on with Denver, where for a time he was the No. 1 quarterback.

Jerry Whelchel replaced McCormack and led UMass to its finest back-to-back seasons. In '63, only a scoreless tie with Harvard marred a perfect slate. The following season the Whelchel to Milt Morin aerial act brought UMass it's first bowl appearance.

The Faculty Athletic Council accepted the Tangerine Bowl's invitation after rejecting it the year before. The Tangerine Bowl was played in Orlando on a high school field with 12,000 seats. UMass lost to East Carolina, 14-13.

Then came Greg Landry. Landry rewrote the Yankee Conference record books, rushing and passing for over 4,700 total yards. In his senior year, he was awarded the Bugler Lowe, and Harry Agganis Awards, as the No. 1 player in New England. He was the first quarterback picked in the '68 pro draft, going to Detroit on the first round.

Success in college athletics does not come cheap. UMass paid the price. It was expensive.

The athletic department's growth and success of the 60's was parallel with the radical changes in the university. A mushrooming enrollment provided higher athletic budgets which enhanced recruiting. And the building fervor of the 60's that's responsible for most of UMass carried over to the tune of 5.5 million in athletic facilties.

Before construction, the estimate on Boyden was $3.5 million. The horses and cows were moved to Deerfield, and a $520,000 intramural complex and outdoor track took their place. And in the fall of '65, the new Alumni Field swung open it's seldom used gates for the first time, with a 1.4 million price tag.

The stadium had to be financed by the Building Authority with bond authorization included in the athletic trust fund budget. It's original capacity of 24,000 was felt far too small for the fast growing university. The attendance figures that the Athletic Dept. hoped for never materialized.

The handwriting may have been on the wall when only 10,200 showed up to watch Greg Landry hit Milt Morin with 2 TD passes in the Stadium's innaugral.

From '66 through '70 the average attendance dipped around 500 each successive year. The average attendance of 14,000 in '66, was down to 12,500 in '69. The slipping attendance ended all talk of expanding to 32,000 or possible 40,000 seats.

Despite the fact that the university had 15,000 more students in '69-'70 than when home games were played at old Alumni Field, (buried beneath Whitmore now) attendance increases were minimal.

Except for UConn, Yankee Conf. foes did not draw well. A homecoming turnout of 18,700 for the '66 BU game was the largest crowd of the decade. Dartmouth, and eastern independents such as Holy Cross; Villanova, and BC, attracted above average crowds. When these independents were added to the schedule, especially BC, the cry went out UMass is going big time.

Cappelletti signs with Rams

JOHN CAPPELETTI

LOS ANGELES (AP) — John Cappellitti, the Heisman Trophy winner from Penn State, signed today with the Los Angeles Rams and said he took less money to join the National Football League club because of the "family" atmosphere he found in the Rams.

Terms of the four-year contract signed by Cappelletti and owner Carrol Rosenbloom at a news conference were not released. But the running back's attorney, said it was substantially less than the more than $500,000, three-year pact offered by Philadelphia of the World Football League.

Cappelletti, a 6-foot-1 217-pounder, and the 11th player selected in the NFL draft, said that he diminishes outside pressures by joining the Rams.

"Because I won the Heisman Trophy, people get the attitude that I have to be the best player on the field," Cappelletti said. "I'm happy to get in a situation where I'll get a chance to break in like anyone else."

"The magic world of MSG"

By SCOTT HAYES

Madison Square Garden.....for two hours last Saturday the home of the Knicks and Rangers became the home of the Minutemen. Nearly 7,000 screaming UMass fans treked to the Garden complex on 33rd Street and 8th Avenue to cheer on their team.

The Garden.....in the midst of all the imperial buildings and small restaurants has a fascination of its own. Fans, who have just fought through lines at Tad's Steak House, The Coney Island Restaurant or some other feculent delicatessen for a bite to eat, are subjected to an impressive sight as they enter the "Magicworld of Madison Square Garden."

One of the most striking views is that of the near-empty Garden before game time. The top level consists of blue-colored seats. Green, yellow and orange seats mark off the different sections that slope down to the premier seats in price and proximity — the brown-colored seats.

From the top level, which can be reached easily ba a fine system of escalators, the rest of the Garden looks perfectly elliptical, centering on the focus of attention — the basketball court or hockey rink.

To those who have watched a televised event from MSG (Madison Square Garden), there are some familiar sights. The well-known Coca-Cola sign, for example, that seems to be in the picture every time the scoreboard is shown and that pops up in action photos in magazines. Another familiarity is the orange-beige ceiling that seems to droop with the weight of the overhead scoreboard.

Only two banners clutter that brilliantly colored ceiling — the 1970 and 1973 Knicks' championship banners — in great contrast with the numerous decorating the hallowed halls of Bruins and Celtic fans — the Boston Garden.

The MSG press-boxes and television broadcast booths are ideally situated so that a reporter or announcer can take in all the action, and still feel the emotions of the crowd.

The adaptability of MSG is also impressive. As well as housing the Knicks and Rangers, the Garden hosts the best in the circus world, The Greatest Show on Earth. The Felt Forum, below the immense reaches of MSG, is the site of bowling and tennis championships, concerts and dances.

The Garden.....where sellouts are the rule rather than the exception wasn't very kind to the vociferous UMass fans. A four point overtime loss put a damper on the early St. Patrick's Day festivities, but there is much to remember and hope for, because the Minutemen will return to the Magicworld, and maybe next time, just maybe, the Garden won't be so ruthless.

Minutewomen won Eastern Triple Crown

A NEAR-PERFECT LANDING by Margie Combs on this vault garnered her the highest score (9.2) of the women's Eastern gymnastics meet.

By CANDY GROSS

The UMass 'gymies' won the "triple crown" at the Easterns weekend, not only capturing the team championship but placing first in all five events (including All Around) and placing the most gymnasts from any one team in Saturday's individual finals.

UMass seven finalists included the three all arounders; Margie Combs, Ann Vexler and Jeannine Burger as well as Betsy East, Heidi Armstrong, Jodi Hitt and Linda Nellingan.

It was never a 'neck and neck' competition, as the Minutewomen ran away with all the honors. The final individual places were determined by totaling the scores from both days. The top six individuals then qualified for the Nationals in California.

Margie Combs wrapped up the first place spot in vaulting and earned the highest score in the entire Easterns with her 9.2 on Friday night. Penn State's Karen Schuckman, 1972 Olympic alternate, place second followed by Kim Andres from Springfield. The final four qualifiers were Sissy Cieply (Clarion), Mary Fedyn (So. Conn.) and a tie between Linda Nelligan and Noreen Muldoon (So. Conn.). Also in the finals for UMass were Heidi Armstrong and Anne Vexler.

Balance beam brought some switches in the placing between Friday and Saturday, but the most noteworthy fact was that five of the six UM gymnasts qualified for this event.

Anne Vexler jumped from a third place spot Friday to win the individual title with a 9.1 Saturday. Second place was a battle ending in a three way tie between Jodi Hitt, previously ninth placed Margie Combs and SC's Kim Andres. Debbie Dunkley (SC) took fifth, and sixth went to Jeannine Burger, who had been in first after Friday's meet. Once against this event was unpredictable. Heidi Armstrong was UMass' fifth finalist on beam.

UMass also dominated floor, taking the top two places. Jeannine Burger, who led Friday, remained there despite a badly sprained ankle. Anne Vexler was second, after cleaning up her tumbling since Friday night's routine. Karen Schuckman (PS), using some unique guitar music, placed third and fourth and fifth went to Springfield gymnasts, Kim Andres and Debbie Dunkley. Final qualifier for floor was Margie Combs in sixth.

Uneven bars was a duel between Jeannine and Karen Schuckman of Penn State who were tied at a 9.0 after Friday's competition. It was Jeannine who won on Saturday with one of her sharpest routines for 9.15. This gave her two of the four event championships, while Shuckman took second with 8.95. Debbie Dunkley (SC) just edged Betsy East by .05 points for the third spot. Betsy, with two clean routines, had moved from sixth to fourth. Fifth went to Springfield freshman Stephanie Jones, and Anne Vexler, tying each other in both day's competition. Margie Combs was the final UMass competitor to qualify for Saturday's meet.

Friday's team competion also determined the all-around champion. Once more the honor went to UMass as Jeannine Burger scored 35.75 points to capture her third Eastern title. Second place went to Anne Vexler who scored 35.1 with Karen Schuckman not too far behind with 34.8 Fourth place was a tie between Margie Combs and Debbie Dunkley at 34.3.

About her new All Around title Jeannine could only say, "I feel really good about winning. Every all-around competitor wants that honor at least once." Her smiling tears said more than words.

Grapplers stumble in national tourney

By JOHN BOCK

AMES, IOWA - The four New England Champions representing UMass in the forty-seventh annual NCAA wrestling Championships faired less than well as they wrestled the best in the nation for top honors in ten weight classes.

Representing UMass at 118 pounds was senior Larry Reynolds who concluded his collegiate career by being the first bout wrestled at the tourney in Iowa State's Hilton Coliseum. His opponent was Western Athletic Conference champ Rick Dawson of Colorado State. He decked Larry in 4:51 but was pinned himself in the next round and thus kept Larry out for good.

At 158 pounds Captain Steve Benson got the surprise of his life when he wrestled Pat Christianson of Wisconsin and ended up on the short side 13-2. "This kid was something else-he'd shoot a single leg really low on your ankles but he shot for my back leg and shot with head on the outside. I was able to pick up the leg every time but I didn't have any balance because I still didn't feel like I had gotten rid of the flu." Christianson, who was third in the Big Ten as a sophomore, lost in the next round and kept Benson out of the consolations.

Heavyweight Dennis Fenton drew a third placer in the Big Ten in the form of Illinois' Palmer Klaas. Klaas caught Dennis in a lateral drop and put him away at 1:59. True to form Klass lost in the next round and that was the tourney for Fenton. "I felt like the smallest heavyweight there," said Fenton, "because when I went for weigh-ins they thought I was a 190 pounder."

The wrestler that achieved the most success for UMass was Russell Chateauneuf who at 134 pounds scored all of the two points that were scored by the Minutemen. He drew Ron Boucher of Oregon State in the first round and beat him 10-5. In the next round he faced defending NCAA Champ Don Rohn of Clarion State and bowed 16-6 but not before putting Rohn on his back in the first seconds of the bout. The blessing about wrestling Rohn was that it put Russ in the consolations where he beat Jeff Gerry of Fresno State 11-2 before getting knocked out for good by William and Mary's Mark Belknap by the same score.

"When I wrestled Dandy Don I was disappointed hat he didn't really wrestle that well but just used his muscle. He had a double leg and showboat move and that was it. The other guys I wrestled were the same-lots of muscle but no real moves."

Coach Homer Barr was not really too disappointed in the wrestlers. "The wrestling was really excellent this year. Larry, for instance, got a really tough kid right off the bat and didn't get a chance to warm up. Steve didn't look too good but he also caught a real mover right away. I thought that Russ wrestled to the best of his ability and am really very pleased with him. Everything taken into consideration it would have been hard for him to do any better."

It was a super tight race for the team title in 1974. Michigan wasthe only major university team to finish the season undefeated and they were the favorite going into the tourney. They would have been the first team to wrest the title away from the Big Eight in almost two decades. The Oklahoma Sooners had something to say about that, however, as they placed three men in the finals and walked off with two champs and the team title. It was Oklahoma U. with 69½ points, Michigan 67, Oklahoma State 64, and Iowa State 63. The Sooners actually owe their title to Jim Woods of Western Illinois who came from an unseeded position at heavyweight to upset three seeded men including second seeded Gary Ernst of Michigan in the finals. If Ernst had won the Wolverines would be wearing the crown.

Peaking skiers grab New England title

By TOM CROWLEY

Despite a lack of snow for practice and a 3-1 win ratio, the UMass ski team won their fifth straight New England Intercollegeiate Ski Conference Championship at Mt. Cranmore, N.H. this past weekend.

In the three day meet, UMass finished third in the giant slalom in the first day of competition and was first in the slalom and the second giant slalom in the next two days to capture the title again.

Bob Chodos, Jim Hawkins, Steve Tonelli, and Larry Peck placed for the Minutemen in the giant slalom. In the slalom, the skiers who scored were Dick McWade, Larry Peck, Jim Hawkins, and Ruff Syer.

UMass had finished third behind Amherst and BC in their division and qualified for tte NEISC invitational. Peaking at the right time, the Minutemen captured their fifth title against a field of 25 teams. The final standing in the league was UMass first, Plymouth State second, and Amherst third.

"We are usually good because we are very deep all the way down," Coach William MacConnell said. "We didn't play up to our ability until late in the season. The lack of snow hurt us in practice time. Amherst College went to France and had three weeks of solid skiining while we had little in comparison."

MacConnell attributed the team's success to a rugged training program. "We ski five days a week during intercesion up at Haystack, Vermont. This way we get a solid performance."

Despite the loss of co-captains Kurt Syer and Dave Rutter and another senior, Dave Ferris, UMass figures to be strong again next season. "But, it could be more difficult," MacConnell said. "UConn and some others are coming on strong."

Blacks protest Collegian, issue statement

By NATHAN GORENSTEIN

Twelve to fifteen black students protesting what they termed "racist" policies and practices of the Collegian called last night for the creation of a council to review black news and issued a statement protesting alleged discrimination in the newspaper's news coverage.

The students, members of an organization called "Corp." read the statement and announced their desire for a review board to a previously called meeting of the Collegian staff.

The meeting of the two groups was a half hour long during which the Corp. members, who refused to give their names, said they would no longer allow articles and cartoons depicting racist sterotypes in the Colllgian. According to their statement,if racism is as "natural a reflex as breathing," they would, "make the Collegian editors...control their breathing if necessary because the days of the old cooning Negro are over!" (see text, page 10).

Collegian editors said last night they were "unclear" as to what Corp meant by their request for a review board, but said they would be meeting with Corp. to discuss that and the issues raised in the statement.

Corp., defined by one member as "a group of students concerned with the actions of the Collegian in terms of reporting actions that affect black people," said they would return to negotiate the issues with the Collegian editors.

While none of the Corp. members present at the Collegian office would give their names, calling it "not of consequence," eight people did sign the statement of grievances which covered a number of issues, including: the lack of coverage at a CCEBS banquet last October; the coverage of an incident in the Blue Wall in February involving two black women; Collegian coverage of the Middle East war and subsequent oil boycott, and the Don McGilvray cartoon of two weeks ago concerning Chancellor Randolph Bromery.

Approximately 30 Collegian staff members debated with Corp. their request for a review board and the Collegian treatment of black community news. One Corp. member accused the Collegian of "conspiring" to inhibit coverage of black news events, which was denied by Collegian staffers.

During a later broadcast on WMUA, John Jones, a spokesman for Corp. said, "We're concerned with working with the Collegian because it is a very important organ of the community," but he added his group met "strong resistance" at the meeting.

The meeting between Corp. and the Colllgian might take place April 1, the date of a previously scheduled meeting between the editor of the Collegian, Karen Lynch, and Pat Grundy, the coordinator of the two month old Black News Service, a news organization aimed at covering black and Third World News both on and off campus.

Sarge wants 'airtight' nuclear plant controls

By MARK VOGLER
MDC Staff

Gov. Francis W. Sargent said yesterday that calling an immediate halt to the construction of nuclear power plants in Massachusetts "is not responsible."

Appearing on WMUV's Telopolitics (UMass videotape presentation of the candidates for Governor) Sargent told campus newsmen that environmental and safety controls on plants must be "airtight" before their construction can continue in the state.

"I disagree with the Atomic Agency Commission when it says they don't need to hold public hearings. They do need to hold hearings, Sargent said.

Before I could approve of further plants in our state, I would have to be satisfied that they are absolutely foolproof."

Sargent said his role as Governor in determining the future of nuclear power conversion in Massachusetts is one of "stop, look and listen."

"We've got to be assured that we're not going to make a decision that will hurt our countryside and the people in the future," he said.

When questioned about a proposed atomic power plant in Montague, 10 miles north of here, Sargent said he would have to see detailed plans for the facility before giving an opinion of it.

He added that if the responsibility to approve the Montague rests with him, he said he would have to be "absolutely satisfied" with all safety elements.

Sargent said he will meet with Consumer advocate Ralph Nader later in the week to discuss the environmental hazards of the plants.

Nader told students at the University of Massachusetts Monday that the Bay State might be a good place to impose the first moratorium on the construction of atomic power plants.

Calling these facilities "Unsafe, unreliable and unnecessary, Nader said he would like to see a national moratorium on atomic power plants.

On Telopolitics, Sargent also commented on his "continued support" to higher education, disputing charges that he had cut the University's budget or those of other state colleges and universities.

The Governor said he had merely cut the budget requests. During his five years in office, Sargent said his administration was responsible for raising the UMass budget from $45-million to $95-million and the construction of four new colleges and eight new campuses.

GOVERNOR FRANCIS SARGENT emphasizes a point during yesterday's Telopolitics. Sargent said that calling an immediate halt to nuclear power plant construction in Massachusetts was "not responsible."

Nixon 'won't resign'; okays Sunday gas sales

HOUSTON, Tex. (AP) - President Nixon, rejecting the proposal of a conservative Republican senator that he quit the White House, said last night it takes "courage to stand and fight for what you think is right, and that's what I intend to do."

The resignation call came from Sen. James L. Buckley of New York, and while Nixon said he respects the senator's viewpoint, he repeated that his resignation could cripple the institution of the presidency.

Nixon began a nationally broadcast appearance before the National Association of Broadcasters by announcing that the end of the Arab oil embargo will ease the gasoline shortage and eliminate any need for rationing.

But Watergate was not far behind: The first question put to him was about Buckley's resignation statement.

"...It perhaps would be an act of courage to resign," Nixon said. "I should also point out, however, that while it might be an act of courage to run away from the job that you were elected to do, it also takes courage to stand and fight for what you think is right and that's what I intend to do."

His statement, essentially a restatement of his position on resignation, drew a round of applause.

Furthermore, Nixon said, for any president to resign "because of charges made against him which he knew were false and because he had fallen in the polls...might be good politics but it would be bad statesmanship."

Nixon said it would permanently undermine the presidency and change the American system of government. He said Buckley's suggestion "does not cause me to reassess my position."

In the Middle East, Nixon said, the United States seeks a permanent peace, "whatever happens to the oil embargo" when Arab oil ministers review its lifting in June.

He said he is confident that progress toward a Middle East peace will help insure that no embargo is imposed again. Nixon opened the news conference with a statement on the effect of the lifting of the oil embargo, saying it permitted him to rescind his order that gasoline stations close on Sundays.

But Nixon said the oil shortage is not yet over, and that voluntary programs of car pooling and lowered speed limits will have to continue.

He also said the "pressure on prices" will continue because imported oil costs about twice as much as domestic oil.

Nixon began a nationally broadcast appearance before the National Association of Broadcasters by saying that because of the end of the embargo, "it will not be necessary for us to have compulsory rationing in the United States."

He said oil allocations to industry and agriculture will be increased, and additional gasoline allocations will be made available to eliminate waiting lines at service stations.

Once again, he appealed to Congress to pass his energy measures, particularly bills to deregulate natural gas, develop new sources and to relax environmental restrictions.

"The greatest shortage of energy is the lack of energy on the part of the Congress of the United States in getting to work and passing the legislation needed to increase the supply of energy," Nixon said.

While Nixon said he was rescinding the Sunday closing order, the gasoline station closings actually have been on a voluntary basis at his request.

The question of additional materials sought by the House Judiciary Committee came up repeatedly, and Nixon said his aides still are discussing the matter with the congressional panel. He did not reply directly to the question of what he would do if additional materials were subpoenaed by the committee.

Later, he rejected a questioner's suggestion that he sought to limit the boundaries of the House inquiry by refusing to turn over additional White House documents and tapes.

He said the House is bound by the Constitution, and its provisions specifying treason, bribery or other high crimes or misdemeanors as grounds for impeachment.

"It is the Constitution that defines what the House should have access to and the limits of its investigation," he said. 'Now, I am suggesting that the House follow the Constitution. If they do, I will."

Nixon said he will try to find a proper way to meet the demands of Congress. But he said he must consider the impact on future presidents, and will do nothing that would weaken the presidency.

"I will not participate in the destruction of the presidency of the United States while I am in this office," he said.

On other points, Nixon:

-Said the economy will remain in "a difficult period" for the next few months, and said beef prices are likely to remain high. But he repeated predictions that prices over-all would begin to moderate in the third quarter of the year.

Correction

Senator Sam J. Ervin (D-N.C.), majority chairman of the senate select committee on campaign activities, will not be coming to UMass to accept a forensic prize, his Washington office said yesterday.

A front page Collegian story in yesterday's edition said Ervin would receive a Speaker of the Year Award at a national debating conference here March 27-30. While the story did not say he would appear to accept the prize, the headline incorrectly did.

"The senator will not be making a trip to Massachusetts at that time," a secretary from the senior senator's Washington office told the Collegian by phone.

Center board denies Union renovations budget charge

By JULIE SMITH
MDC Staff

The Campus Center Board of Governors at the close of last week, denied that they were planning a 1½-2 million dollar budget for renovation of the Student Union.

"There is no need for people to feel that the Board of Governors will act without student involvement," said David Winchester, Vice-Chairperson of the Board of Governors. "We are trying to get the best results with the lowest cost, then we will present it to the community."

The Board felt a number of areas have to be renovated. A Student Union Task Force has been set up to evaluate various alternatives for renovation. Areas under evaluation are the Hatch, Blue Wall, and the alleyway between the Student Union and Campus Center. Both the Blue Wall and the Hatch were designed to be cafeterias, not bars. Also more meeting rooms are planned and a upgrading of office space.

Most of the Student Senate felt the Board of Governors were going to pass this budget. John O'Keefe of the Senate Communications Committee, felt the Board was hiring people to study the Student Union. He said Arthur D. Little Company had been hired for $35,000.

O'Keefe felt this budget started last semester with a Collegian article.

"The article was a 'trial balloon' for the Board of Governors." O'Keefe said. "They proposed a liquor store and stero shop. My opinion is that it was to see people's reactions."

"They had planned to make the Student Union into a mall. It would be bringing Route 9 into the Union. It's outside interest to rip off the community. The Union's first priorities should be to student talent and crafts before Valley interests," O'Keefe said.

To prevent an expensive budget from being passed, the Student Senate passed a motion that any renovation of the Student Union of over $10,000 in one month will have to come before the Senate.

New channel 3 to feature more news, public affairs

By MICKIE HALL
MDC Staff

A new source of energy is the aim of WFSB-TV Channel 3 of Hartford, according to Dan Gold, new general manager of WFSB-TV.

Recently, Washington Post-Newsweek bought WTIC-TV Channel 3 from Traveler's Insurance. The call letters have been changed to WFSB. However, the station will continue to be affiliated with CBS.

More focus on eyewitness news and public affairs will be evident in the news format beginning in April.

The WFSB-TV local evening news will be expanded from one half hour to one hour. This will be followed by the CBS report.

Local news will be added to the Sunday evening format. The late Sunday evening report will contain both local and CBS news. It has been strictly a CBS report in the past.

The CBS morning news will include news for the deaf.

"WFSB-TV is expanding its news to incorporate more commentaries and editorials," Gold said. "These will be included in the format everyday and will be regionally oriented."

Time will be made available to those people who wish to respond to the commentaries and editorials.

Gold added that the WFSB-TV news will contain consumer oriented features, more film, and push for audience involvement.

New programs will be added to the WFSB-TV schedule in late March or April.

"New England Journal" will be a regionally oriented show with attention on local news, public affairs, entertainment, and problems in the community.

A discussion of the week's news will be the topic of "Agronsky & Co.". Opinionated newsmen will discuss major news stories of the past week and offer individual views.

Generally included on the panel will be Martin Agronsky, winner of many broadcast journalism awards; James J. Kilpatrick, syndicated columnist; Carl Rowan, syndicated columnist and commentator; Hugh Sidney, Washington bureau chief for Time magazine; Peter Lisagor, Washington bureau chief for the Chicago Daily News; Elizabeth Drew, Washington editor for the Atlantic magazine; and George F. Will, Washington editor of the National Review.

"Every Women" will be an interview program pertaining to women, but of interest to both men women. The format will center around issues regarding women, changing family roles, and male and female relationships.

Film classics prior to 1938 will be shown each week on "Cinema Club". Many have never before been viewed on television. This is WFSB-TV's answer to the nostalgia kick.

New religious programs, Spanish speaking shows, and black oriented programs will also be added to the new WFSB-TV schedule.

Introducing 10 to 17 year-olds to the world around them will be the idea behind "Doing-Being". Segments of the show will be devoted to a community project undertaken by young people, crafts, job preparation, and a rap session.

Noted psychic here tomorrow

By FRED NOBLES
MDC Staff

In 1937 he "communicated mind-to-mind" with Sir Hubert Wilkins 3,000 miles away in the Arctic, not long ago he communicated with Astronaut Edgar Mitchell while Mitchell was on the Apollo 14 moon flight, last April his mind raveled to the vicinity of Jupiter and tomorrow night he'll be at Mahar auditiroium to discuss his experiences. Harold Sherman, founder and first president of the ESP Research Associates Foundation, is described as "the world's eminent lay authority on Extra Sensory Perception" and "one of the world's foremost sensitives."

Sherman's lecture tomorrow night at eight is the most recent offering in the Division of-Continuing Education's program of exploration into psychic phenomena.

The program began last September with a nine week course, "Explorations in ESP" taught by psychic Claudette Kiely. The interest generated by that course led to another, "Harmony of Healing" taught by faith healer Floyd McAuslan and ultimately to the formation of the independent Amherst Psychical Society.

Continuing Education Program Director Norman Vercoe, who is primarily responsible for getting the program underway, hopes to hold a psychic phenomena workshop at UMass this summer. Mr. Vercoe plans to get about fourteen of the "top psychics in the country" to participate in the workshop and expects an attendance of anywhere from 500 to 1,000 at the three day event.

Mr. Vercoe credited the growing local and national interest in psychic phenomena as the primary reason the Continuing Education program has expanded so rapidly. He noted that more than 75 schools now offer courses dealing with aspects of parapsychology and that the national interest has reached such a level that both Time and Newsweek have run features on the subject.

Describing what is currently known of ESP and related phenomen as merely "the tip of the iceberg," Mr. Vercoe stressed the need for greater interest and research into this subject by educational institutions. "50 to 100 years from new we'll laugh at what we're doing now," noted Vercoe, but the local interest has reached such a level that he feels the UMass faculty should seriously consider the subject. "There are four people taking our courses now who would like to get degrees in parapsychology but no school offers such a program."

In an effort to keep pace with the growing local interest, continuing Ed. will be offering a new course, "Search for God and Psychic Healing" beginning March 28 and dealing with Edgar Cayse readings.

Meanwhile, Harold Sherman, author of 17 books on psychic phenomena, will be at Mahar tomorrow. Tickets are $1.50 for students and can be purchased at room 920 of the Campus Center or at the door.

Anyone wanting further information on any aspects of the psychic phenomena program should visit the Division of Continuing Education in room 315 Hills North or call 545-0554.

Area govts ask Apostola to quit

By FRAN BROCK

Five Area Governments have voted to ask Student Government President, Nick Apostola, to resign. The Commuter Assembly will not vote until today.

Orchard Hill, Central, Northeast and the Greek Areas voted on the bill written by the Area Presidents, Monday night. Southwest and Sylvan voted last night.

Central's vote is not known as yet.

SW. Sylvan and the Commuter Assemblies asked Apostola to attend their meetings in order that he might defend himself. Apostola informed the Presidents of Orchard Hill and Central that he would be unable to attend because he would be in Boston.

According to Larry St. Cyr and Dave Hirsh, Presidents of Southwest and Northeast, respectively, there are four major points behind the resignation request:

1)Apostola promised to revise the Constitution over the summer but nothing was done, 2)He promised to have more contact with Areas and de-centralize the government but he has avoided the Areas and has proposed more central power-including a fusing of the Student and Graduate Senates, 3) Apostola has been lax about committee appointments, letting some go two to three months, 4) He has consistantly mis-represented the President's Council to the Student Senate.

St. Cyr and Hirsh, told told the SW Assembly last night that keeping Apostola in office would "do more harm than good." They say that Apostola has "effectively dissolved" the President's Council, along with dismissing other boards.

The Areas feel Apostola has not been acting responsibly with his powers and has not been representing the Areas properly at the Board of Trustees or in meetings with the Administration.

According to one Student Senator, Apostola had said he would resign if any constituency requested.

SENATE ELECTIONS

Are there any people out there whose consciousness extends beyond streaking and complaining? The Student Senate is looking for individuals with some desire to deal with the real problems facing us (dining commons, rents, alienation, our own racism and sexism, bus service, rip-off's).

Vacancies exist in the following areas: Baker (1), Commuter (8), Crampton (1), Dickenson (1), Gorman (1), Greyson (1), Knowlton (1), New Africa House (3), Wheeler (1), and Sorority's (2).

Elections will be held April 3 & 4. Nomination papers may be picked up in the Student Senate office (room 420 Student Union) and are due April 1 at 4 p.m.

Bicycle Club trips on wheels

By FRITS GEURTSEN

Last in a three-part series on Bicycling, Frits Geurtsen talks about the enjoyment in owning a bicycle — the UMass Bicycle Club.

The UMass Bicycle club is a group of students who believe that a bike can be used for more than just getting from class to class.

Lynn Avery, president of the organization, described it as "bicycle club, open to everyone, which is basically oriented toward touring."

"In the past," he said, "The group has gone to Cape Cod and Martha's Vineyard. There are other trips planned for this semester, but we really don't start until April when it gets a bit warmer."

For those cyclists interested in racing, Avery recommended the Century Road Club of Amherst and the Valley Cycle Club of Northampton.

"We are in the process," Avery said, "Of setting up a bicycle workshop. We're trying to round up all the various tools now. The workshop will be open to everyone."

Also on the agenda for the Bike Club this semester are movies dealing with bicycling, which will be open to the public.

"One thing that should be of great interest to cyclists," Avery concluded, "is a tentative plan to add bicycle paths to Route 9, when that gets enlarged in the future. That would be from here to Northampton."

(Staff Photo-Dan Smith)

FASTER THAN A SPEEDING BULLET it might not be, but the bicycle has gained a place as one of the main modes of transportation on campus. Despite a problem with thefts, it seems likely that ownership and usage will increase.

Dissent in the journalism department?

By JAN ALEXANDER
MDC Staff

In a series of recent interviews, it was revealed that the journalistic studies program is surrounded by some confusion and controversy.

Whatever I have said has been completely ignored," said journalistic studies professor Dario Politella, "I don't know anything, no one tells me anything. I usually hear things through word of mouth, or I read it. The department never has meetings."

Howard M. Ziff is the present director of the program. Hired in September of 1971, the former Chicago newspaperman was promoted from associate to full professor this February because of his "outstanding administrative excellance, plus his high prestige in the profession", according to English Department Head Joseph Frank.

Usually six years are spent as an associate professor and another six as an assistant professor, before there is a promotion to full professor. But there is no hard and fast rule and promotions are sometimes made based on ability of the professor, and the needs of the specific department.

Lawrence Pinkham and Ralph Whitehead were later hired by Ziff as associate professors.

"There was some confusion in the personnel appointments", said Politella, "I didn't know they were hiring new people. I thought that a consensus of opinion was usually taken within a department on a hiring, but perhaps this is a new policy.

"They were probably hired to bolster Ziff's program, but I'm not sure because there has been nothing written about the program."

"Different departments have different hiring practices," Ziff contends. "The English department has a recruitment committee who decides who they want to interview. In addition, interested people across campus including students submit a letter of impressions. There is both a formal and informal screening, and I usually invite applicants to my home to meet with present faculty members."

"We're growing, but under what basis?" Politella asks. "The administration works in mysterious ways."

Professor Barney Emmart was hired for the journalistic studies program in 1966 and was refused tenure in June of 1972 because, according to Joseph Frank, "he lacked the requirements of good teaching, good scholarship, and good service". Emmart left the university in June of 1973.

"I don't know the official reasons for the refusal", said Politella. "He had a PH.D and an excellent professional and academic background. His specialty was research theory and international communication. They must have decided his specialty was no longer needed."

Arthur Musgrave, a journalistic studies professor here since 1936, has other complaints. He and Emmart had a "co-curricular tutorial program" set up whereby students had a liberal arts major and wrote for local newspapers to gain practical experience.

"This program was illegally destroyed when Ziff came here", said Musgrave. "A newswriting course taught by a former reporter is worthless. Students can only profit by practical experience on a regular newspaper."

"There should be a paid full-time journalism director, who is experienced as an editor in hiring and firing, then employers would be more likely to hire graduates of the program."

"I am wary of providing free labor for profit-making institutions," said Ziff, "There were also two things wrong with the program: Students would learn bad habits from a bad newspaper, and you have to have a faculty that can supervise it, which we don't have the money for now."

Ziff stated the present requirements as 'A double major, with the student taking 15 journalistic studies credits, 6 of which should be English writing courses."

"Musgrave violently disagrees with my philosophy. For routine decisions, he insists on a full dress debate. For 15 years before I came, the program had been plagued by personal problems. I make a point of starting with a clean slate, which is sometimes difficult."

Joseph Frank backed Ziff by stating, "The program was an absolute mess when I came here. Now it's beginning to be an exciting, viable and humanistic enterprise."

Sports fee: not pay for play

By LAWRENCE KORNFELD

Contrary to popular opinion the $30 a year "Athletic Fee" doesn't cover intramurals, game tickets, or regular student use of the athletic facilities. It all goes into inter-collegiate sports according to Al Rufe, Financial Manager of Athletics.

The money is divided up between 38 varsity and junior varsity teams competing in 23 inter-collegiate sports, 15 men's and eight women's.

Yet the Athletic Fee money, which comes to over $520,000 a year, only pays one third of the cost of inter-collegiate sports at UMass. The other two thirds is paid by the state.

The Athletic Fee was set up in 1965 by the Board of Trustees to support an expanded inter-collegiate sports program.

Athletic Director Frank McInerney justifies the paying of the fee by students, whether they have an interest in sports or not, by saying: "It goes far beyond the fact that many people watch and participate in it. It represents UMass provides an living learning experience...and gives the students something to rally around."

He sees the inter-collegiate program as a public relations program for giving people a "good feeling" about UMass. "It helps the University extend itself as a quality academic institution;" McInerney added.

Six of the 30 dollars a year goes to paying for building and maintenance of the football stadium. The rest is divided among other expenses including: equipment, officials, ticket takers, janitors, transportation, lodging, meals, security, and Yankee Conference dues.

Advisory nuke vote slated for May

A referendum question asking whether the town should support plans by Northeast Utilities to build a nuclear power plant in Montague will be on that town's election ballot in May. The ballot question, sponsored by Montague selectman is purely advisory.

Donald H. Skole, the selectman who initiated the move said that his action does not indicate personal opposition to the nuclear plant which is a dual facility estimated to cost $1.35 billion.

Skole said that he wanted to get a clearer idea of how the townspeople felt about the proposed construction scheduled for completion in 1983.

There were only four supporters at November's special town meeting proposed by David Wood, who asked for funds to study possible dangers of the plant. Skole said it seemed that those actively opposing construction composed about 10 per cent of the town's population and he and other selectmen wanted to find out if this was actually so.

Skole said that Montague is planning to engage a consultant to study the effects of the proposed project on population, environment, ecology and roads.

Parking fee

When the Balanced Transportation and Parking System was started last year, students were offered the option of paying the parking convenience fee in two installments. All students selecting this option were billed during intersession.

Any student who has not paid the balance of his parking fee is urged to do so prior to April 1, 1974. Parking fees unpaid after that date will be considered grounds for revoking campus parking privileges.

Any questions concerning billing should be directed to the Parking Office, 103 Hampshire, Tel. 545-0065.

Buckley calls for Nixon's resignation

WASHINGTON (AP) - Sen. James L. Buckley, a conservative Republican who strongly supports President Nixon's policies, called yesterday for Nixon's resignation to preserve the presidency and pull the nation "out of the Watergate swamp."

At a packed news conference in the Senate Caucus Room that was the scene of last year's Watergate hearings, Buckley said Nixon's resignation would at once serve "the greater interests of the nation, the institution of the presidency and the state goals for which he so successfully campaigned."

He said that Watergate has created an unparalleled national crisis that impeachment can never resolve. "If the President withdrew," Buckley said, "this crisis would be resolved."

In the Senate, Buckley said he had received some support, some opposition in private talks with fellow GOP conservatives. Two of them, Sens. Barry Goldwater of Arizona and Jesse Helms of North Carolina, promptly opposed his call, but said they would favor resignation if Nixon is guilty.

Party conservatives have been Nixon's chief supporters. Buckley said he hopes his stand will have some impact on Nixon because it comes "from quarters that are basically friendly to the President, sympathetic to what he has tried to advance."

Sen. Edward W. Brooke of Massachusetts is the only other Republican U.S. senator to call for Nixon's resignation. Unlike Brooke, a liberal, Buckley is, as he described himself, "a life-long Republican who has worked actively for Richard Nixon."

He was elected to the Senate in 1970 with the administration's help as the candidate of New York's Conservative party, defeating liberal Republican Sen. Charles E. Goodell and a Democrat.

As one who saw in Nixon's 1972 victory "both the mandate and the opportunity to carry forth reforms of historic significance for the nation," Buckley said, "today, just 16 months later, it is my conviction that the President has been stripped of the ability to fulfill that mandate."

Warning that a prolonged impeachment debate would only exacerbate the situation, Buckley said, "There is only one way and one way only by which the crisis can be resolved, and the country pulled out of the Watergate swamp."

Buckley stressed that he shares Nixon's desire to preserve the presidency's powers, saying "The only way to save it is for the current President to resign, leaving the office free to defend itself with a new incumbent."

Buckley said his position was taken "regardless of innocence or guilt" of the President and that, in the event of an impeachment trial, "The country will be in for a trauma the dimensions of which the country has not thought through."

Goldwater, in a statement, said he understands Buckley's feeling but that "too many questions arise when it comes to asking for the resignation of President Nixon," including the danger of such a precedent.

Vice President Gerald R. Ford told reporters he does not believe Nixon should resign.

"There are no proven charges against him," Ford said. "And resignation under these circumstances would be ill advised."

Sen. Charles H. Percy, R-Ill., said that Buckley's statement makes the situation "more perilous" for the President and that if Nixon does not resign, Congress will have no choice but to continue the impeachment process.

Disengagement talks to start March 29

WASHINGTON (AP) - The United States and Israel yesterday set March 29 as the date for the beginning of serious negotiations on a disengagement of Israeli and Syrian forces in the Golan Heights.

The date was fixed by Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger and Israeli Foreign Minister Abba Eban in a one-hour talk at the State Department.

Eban told newsman that Israel was "prepared for the kind of concrete and pragmatic compromise that is necessary to reach agreement" with Syria.

The negotiations will open with the arrival of an Israeli team headed by Defense Minister Moshe Dayan.

Now that a date is set, Kissinger said he would "get in touch with the Syrian government" on the who would represent Damascus and when the Syrian mission would arrive.

The talks will begin two weeks later than originally planned.

Kissinger rejected a reporter's suggestion that there had been a "hangup" in arranging the negotiations. He said the delay was caused by "a necessity to prepare positions very carefully."

Kissinger set up the "reverse shuttle" -- having the Israelis and Syrians come here -- on a swing through the Middle East that ended March 2.

As senior officials explained Kissinger's plans then, he was to deal first with the Israelis and then - separately - sometime afterward with the Syrians.

But George S. Vest, the department spokesman, told newsmen that "the scenario is still unclear." That is, Vest said, "we have no prejudice in reference to consecutive sessions."

Eight persons killed during food riots in Indian state

NEW DELHI, India (AP)- Student-led riots over food scarcities and high prices spread across Bihar State yesterday despite army and police reinforcements rushed in to control the mobs.

Policemen and soldiers opened fire on the unruly street crowds, killing eight persons and injuring several others, United News of India reported.

Authorities in the state capital of Patna, 500 miles southeast of New Delhi, lifted their curfew from 5 to 6 p.m. to allow residents to buy food.

The state radio claimed calm had been restored in Patna but acknowledged that new violence was erupting in several other towns in the state, one of the poorest in India.

A British relief organization, the Oxford Committee for Famine Relief, predicted in New Delhi that the Bihar grain crop probably would fail to meet even half the state's requirements.

The violence erupted Monday as student-led crowds tried to block the state legislature's opening session in a demonstration of dissatisfaction over shortages of essential food grains, high food prices, corruption and unemployment.

Similar student agitation over economic hardships brought down the Gujarat State government and forced Prime Minister Indira Gandhi to disband the legislature in that state, on the other side of India about 450 miles southwest of New Delhi.

Confusion surrounds March 21 meeting

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Nixon has offered three different views of the meeting a year ago when John W. Dean told him of hush money payments, giving rise to a continuing barrage of questions.

The confusion of what was said at that meeting March 21 is compounded not only by the President's statements but also the versions offered by the other participants, Dean and H.R. Haldeman.

It boils down to this:

Was the President told that money being paid to the seven original Watergate defendants was for legal costs?

Or was he told the money was to buy silence?

Did he understand what he was told was a fact, or did he take it as an allegation?

Legal defense funds are a common practice; there is nothing unlawful about them. But paying hush money is obstruction of justice, a serious crime.

In one of his first major Watergate statements, the President said he learned March 21 about the possible involvement of top aides in the Watergate cover-up. He said he began "intensive new inquiries into this whole matter." He reported "major developments," but said he couldn't be specific.

Then came the Senate Watergate hearings. Dean said he told Nixon about money demands being made by the defendants and that about that time Haldeman joined the conversation.

Apparently Dean got his dates wrong. He said he recalled it as a meeting March 21 — and Haldeman said he had listened to a tape recording and confirmed that.

Whatever the date, Dean claimed he told Nixon it might cost as much as $1 million eventually to meet the demands.

"He told me that was no problem and he also looked over at Haldeman and repeated the same statement." Dean testified.

Haldeman, in his Senate testimony, recalled that "the President said 'there is no problem in raising a million dollars, we can do that, but it would be wrong."

The President addressed the point for the first time on Aug. 15 in a statement. He said he was told only "that funds had been raised for payments to the defendants, with the knowledge and approval of persons both on the White House staff and the re-election committee."

And he added the point that became the focus of the dispute: "I was only told that the money had been used for attorneys' fees and family support, not that it had been paid to procure silence from the recipients."

At a news conference at San Clemente a week late, Nixon supported the Haldeman version as accurate and said that on March 21 Dean was concerned about "not so much the raising of money for the defendants, but the raising of money for the defendants for the purpose of keeping them still — in other words, so-called hush-money."

The matter remained fairly dormant until March 1, when Haldeman and six others were indicted in the cover-up.

The grand jury had listened to a tape recording of that March 21 meeting — one of the nine that had been fought for through the courts — and charged Haldeman with lying when he quoted Nixon as saying "it would be wrong."

Did he, the President was asked on March 6, say it would be wrong.

"For the first time on March 21, he Dean told me that payments had been made to defendants for the purpose of keeping them quiet — you describe it as hush money — that, of course, would have been an obstruction of justice."

The President explained he pointed out to Dean that raising the money and paying it was something that could be done but that it was linked to clemency and "no individual is simply going to stay in jail because people are taking care of his family."

"I then said that to pay clemency was wrong," Nixon said. "I think I can quote it directly. I said, "it is wrong, that is for sure."

Television appearance denied to accused SLA killers

MARTINEZ, Calif. (AP) - A judge denied yesterday a request for a national television appearance by two jailed Symbionese Liberation Army members who claim they have suggestions that could lead to freedom for kidnaped heiress Patricia Hearst.

The judge said he was afraid such an appearance by the two men, who are in prison on murder charges, could make it impossible for them to get a fair trial.

Miss Hearst's father, newspaper executive Randolph A. Hearst, said he was disappointed. "I haven't read the whole decision," Hearst said. "I don't see how any statement that might possible bring about the release of our daughter could keep the defendants from getting a fair trial. I need time to think it over."

In turning down the request, Contra Costa County Superior Court Judge Sam Hall said: "It could create an atomsphere that would make it impossible for the defendants to receive a fair trial in California or in the United States. I can't let this happen."

The terrorist Symbionese Liberation Army, which says it kidnaped the 20-year-old coed Feb. 4, had threatened to sever all communications with Miss Hearst's family unless Joseph Remire, 27, and Russell Little, 24, got the televised appearance.

The pair are charged in Oakland with the assassination Nov. 6 of Oakland School Supt. Dr. Marcus Foster, and the attempted murder of a Concord policeman in a shootout Jan. 10 in which they were captured.

Wounded Knee phone not tapped: Gov't

ST. PAUL, Minn (AP) - The former Justice Department negotiator at the seige of Wounded Knee, S.D., says he assured a lawyer for Indians that a telephone line from the village was not illegally tapped.

Kent Frizzell, solicitor for the Interior Department and formerly an assistant U.S. attorney general, said yesterday he got assurances from the FBI that it was not eavesdropping on conversations in and out of the village.

Frizzell testified at an evidentiary hearing called by U.S. District Judge Fred Nichol in the trial of American Indian Movement (AIM) leaders Dennis Banks, 41, St. Paul, and Russell Means, 34, Porcupine, S.D. They are accused of burglary and theft, among other charges, in the armed occupation that began Feb. 27, 1973.

Their six attorneys were in court yesterday, as the defense tried to prove that the government had an illegal wiretap operating just outside Wounded Knee. The defendants seek dismissal on this and other grounds of alleged misconduct.

Mark Lane, a defense attorney, testified he made many telephone calls into and out of Wounded Knee during the 71-day occupation by 200 or more Indians and white sympathizers.

Bud Drinkers, can you figure this out?

Ralph bought a 6-pak of Budweiser® and invited four friends over to share it. Since he bought, he expected to have two cans to himself, but unfortunately when he returned to the refrigerator for his second, he found it missing. So he asked who took it. Al said, "Joe drank it." Joe said, "Dan drank it." Dan said, "Joe, that's a lie!" And Bill said, "I didn't drink it." If only one of these statements is true, who really drank it?

ANSWER: If you assume Al is the guilty one, Dan's and Bill's statements are true. If you think it's Joe, then Al's and Dan's statements are true. And if you think Dan did it, then Joe's and Bill's statements are true. Obviously Bill is the Bud® snatcher, since then only Dan's statement would be true. Moral: If Ralph had bought five 6-paks, they could have spent more time drinking and less time arguing.

The energy crisis

Rationing coupons collector's items

WASHINGTON (AP) — With the oil embargo off, the government is locking up 4.8 billion ration coupons printed at a cost of $12 million in hopes they'll never be used.

They may become collector's items one day. They may be destroyed. Or they may be locked up for several years until the energy crisis eases.

Meantime, the government's biggest worry is security. The coupons are being distributed to various locations around the country and kept under lock and key.

If any are pilfered, it immediately raises the problem of possible counterfeiting or an inflated value for the coupon since the others are being kept in storage, officials said Tuesday.

James B. Conlon, director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, said that "we have set up pretty stringent security" to make sure none of the coupons is stolen.

Energy officials, ordered by the White House to keep quite about the lifting of the embargo until President Nixon had commented, would only say that a study will be ordered to determine what will be done with the huge batch of coupons.

The Bureau of Engraving and Printing began printing the coupons in late January. The job won't be finished until the end of the month, Conlon said. Two commercial bank-note houses are printing about one-fifth of the supply.

The 4.8-billion supply is enough to run a ration program for three months, he said.

The government's presses have been running around the clock to finish the job, and printing of currency has been suspended until the entire coupon supply is ready. The nation's Federal Reserve banks have an excess of currency.

The coupons looks like miniature dollar bills, carrying the same engraving of George Washington that appears on the greenback. They are black, gray and white.

Now, with rationing a slim possibility, Americans may never see them in circulation. And that is fine with the Nixon administration, which sharply opposes rationing.

Why spend $12 million then? "We would have been remiss in our duty if we hadn't, and rationing had really become necessary," and energy official said, "As it is, it is taking two months to print them."

Simon says: more oil price increases

WASHINGTON (AP) — U.S. energy chief William E. Simon said yesterday the end of the Arab oil embargo will cause further price increases on gasoline and fuel oil in the United States.

Simon added that federal allocation of petroleum would continue and that fuel conservation efforts would still be required despite the lifting of the embargo.

As Simon spoke to the National Association of Realtors, the American Automobile Association reported that gasoline supplies were the best they have been this year.

The motorists' organization said spot checks of 6,225 stations showed only three per cent were out of gas last week when questioned. The previous week 5 per cent were out and two weeks earlier 20 per cent had dry pumps.

Simon warned that the end of the embargo may bring "a temporary surplus of certain supplies or at least a temporary sufficiency" which "may lull people into thinking they can go back to business as usual."

But he said this is not so.

"We are going to have to conserve energy...people are going to have to cut down on extra trips and use car pools."

He said continued restraints would be necessary because of both the continued supply limitations and instability of the world oil market and the economic burden of foreign oil prices, which have quadrupled over the past six months.

A newsman asked Simon if the arrival of greater supplies of petroleum from the Middle East would cause prices here to fall in response to the usual relation between supply and demand.

"It's just the reverse this time," Simon said.

He said as additional supplies of high-priced oils are imported, these high prices will be blended into the total cost of U.S. petroleum, causing retail prices of gasoline and fuel oil to increase still further.

"Gasoline is going to cost more and so is heating oil, he said, but he declined to estimate how large the price increases may be.

Simon pointed out it would be at least two months or longer before the additional imports would begin reaching American consumers.

The AAA report Tuesday indicated that the number of stations pumping gasoline at night and on weekends increased again in the past week.

Fewer stations are limiting purchases, more stations are open after 7 p.m. on weekdays and fewer stations are staggering hours between early morning and late afternoon shifts, AAA said.

The organization said it found 7 per cent of the stations contacted were closing their pumps by noon on weekdays, compared to 9 per cent at last report. Twenty-nine per cent of the statons were pumping fuel after 7 p.m. on weekdays — one per cent more than last report.

The number of stations open on Saturday jumped two per cent, to 65 per cent, and the number open on Sundays remained steady at 17 per cent, AAA said. Only 20 per cent of the stations are limiting gasoline purchases. In the last report, 22 per cent were limiting purchases.

AAA said 16 states continued to use the odd-even license tag gasoline distribution plan, where motorists with odd tags get gas on odd dates and motorists with even tags filled up on even dates. In addition, county or city plans are in effect in seven other states.

Six turnpikes are using the odd-even plan, AAA said, and most dealers on major turnpikes are limiting purchases. Stations on the New Jersey, Oklahoma and Florida turnpikes and the Garden State Parkway and Indiana Toll Road are open 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

Days to restore production months until oil arrives

BEIRUT, Lebanon (AP) — American oilmen said yesterday it will take a few days to restore oil production cuts imposed by the Arabs during the October war against Israel.

Oil industry sources disclosed that some Arab governments have not yet officially notified their foreign concessionaires of the Vienna decision to lift the anti-American embargo as of yesterday and restore production cuts, primarily because some oil ministers have not yet returned from Europe.

"This is a matter of one or two days," said a spokesman for Aramco, the Arabian-American oil company operating in Saudi Arabia. "We are in contact with the Saudi government every day. As soon as we get official notification, we will tell our people and wait for the tankers to show up."

A number of empty tankers were reported waiting in Middle East ports for orders to start leading, but the Aramco spokesman said "this is not the case at Ras Tanura" in Saudi Arabia.

"They are probably on the way," he added. "When they will arrive is anybody's guess. Leading takes about a day. And it will take one to two months for the tankers to reach the American coast."

The Aramco spokesman and sources in several other oil companies said it would only take "a few days" to restore ARab wells to their pre-October production levels.

Oil from the Algerian ports could reach the United States more quickly over a shorter route. In Algiers officials said the government had accepted the Arab decision to lift the embargo and there was nothing to prevent loading of oil at Algerian ports.

Algeria exported $19 million worth of petroleum products to the United States in 1973. The country accepted the lifting of the embargo with some reluctance, and with the specific reservation that it may be reimposed if there has been no progress toward a Middle East settlement within two months.

Libya, which along with Syria opposed the lifting of the oil embargo announced in Vienna on Monday, callld the decision an "act of treason" especially since fighting was flared again on the Golan Heights border between Syria and Israel.

In the Netherlands a Foreign Ministry spokesman said the embargo remaining against Holland will hurt not only Holland but all of Europe. Rotterdam, a main oil transit point, will suffer from the continued embargo, he said, and since the port is an integral part of Europe's economic life, this will hurt all Europe too.

In continuing the embargo against the Netherlands and Denmark, the Arab countries claimed they were still unfriendly to the Arab cause.

The Middle East Economic Survey, a well-informed oil journal, said Arab countries had cut back production by 2,939,000 barrels per day. That amount would restore production to September 1973 levels of 20,470,000 barrels per day.

Scramble on for domestic land with oil and gas potential

DALLAS (AP) - Booming oil demands and profits and Arab-induced urgency have triggered a scramble to lease land that might yield new oil and gas supplies.

Land brokers for several major oil firms say they are working overtime trying to lease federal and private land with possibilities for oil and gas. Prices of leases have doubled in some areas and competition for prime spots is fierce.

The land rush is greater now than in several years, says Bill Allbright, president of the American Association of Petroleum Landmen.

Causes for the scramble have many roots but higher prices for oil and refined products are the biggest reason, industry spokesmen say.

Oil from wells producing in 1972 brings $5.25 a barrel under federal controls. Newly found oil sells for $10 or more a barrel. The price a year ago was about $3.50 for any oil, "old" or "new".

"It's hope for the future, Allbright said. "Without the leases, you don't have a whole lot of hope. What you have now is gradually being depleted."

He said leases are to the oilman what "beans on the shelf" are to the grocer.

Total domestic crude oil production is currently running at about 9.2 million barrels a day, down by about 200,000 barrels from the same time last year, industry figures show. The United States needs about 19 million barrels a day to meet its needs, federal energy officials estimate. The gap is filled with imported oil, now in short supply.

The scramble for new sources of domestic oil has so far not produced enough oil to boost domestic production figures. Meanwhile, the old wells, many of them 30 to 40 years old, aren't producing as much as they once did, industry spokesman say.

Half NE stations pump all day long

BOSTON (AP) — About half of the gasoline stations surveyed by the American Automobile Association in New England are now pumping gasoline all day long, and a number are beginning to pump during evening hours as well.

The association reported that waiting lines are either non-existent or short, and most stations are filling tanks instead of limiting sales.

Sunday closings are still widespread, according to the survey, but some stations are beginning to pump on Sundays.

Turnpike and toll road service stations have extended their hours and increased amounts of gasoline available to motorists, the AAA said.

G.O.P. claims legislature too lengthy

BOSTON (AP) - The Massachusetts legislature has become the longest running political show in all 50 states, and the Republican minority is getting angrier as the annual sessions get longer.

The Republicans, outnumbered by more than three to one in both branches of the legislature, want to set an arbitrary limit of six or seven months on the presently open ended sessions.

Their chance of success, based on opposition from the Democrats, is about the same as that of Don Quixote against the windmill.

House Minority Leader Francis W. Hatch Jr., R-Beverly, has told the legislature's Judiciary Committee that Massachusetts is one of only 12 states without limits on the length of the legislative session.

Hatch says every one of the other 11 states ends their sessions "months" before Massachusetts, although some do return for special sessions on specific issues.

In seven of the last 12 years, Massachusetts' legislative sessions have continued into September, after starting the first week in January as required by law. The 1973 session ended Nov. 30.

In three of the last 12 years, the sessions have continued for 12 months and overlapped in the following year.

"What is it about this legislature that makes us so special?" Hatch has asked. "We certainly don't do any more work than some other legislatures."

Hatch and 14 other Republicans have filed legislation to limit the sessions to seven months. Senate Minority Leader John F. Parker, R-Tauton, has filed his own bill to limit the annual session to six months.

Hatch insists the shorter session would force legislators to work harder.

At present, the legislative work week is four days, sometimes only three. The House and Senate hold Friday sessions only during prorogation-the last segment of the work year.

Sometimes Thursdays are only half workdays since legislators are anxious to get home for their long weekends.

Legislators have always defended the short work weeks by saying they must take the peoples' pulse back in their districts.

Parker, however, says the long sessions are "exasperating."

"A six month session might seem like a rash proposal but it would be doing a favor for ourselves and the taxpayers. We could cut down on a lot of the junky legislation we get now," Parker says.

But Democrats, who have controlled the legislature for more than a decade are not interested in change.

Marijuana defeated

BOSTON (AP) - The Social Welfare Committee voted 12-6 yesterday against a bill legalizing possession of one ounce of marijuana.

Rep. Michael F. Flaherty, D-Boston, House chairman, said the committee has been polled and the results will be presented at a session next Tuesday when, he added, further action is anticipated on all other pending marijuana bills.

"I expect the vote will be about the same on all of them," Flaherty said. They deal with proposed referenda, and studies.

Flaherty said the committee voted to have a poll of all members on all marijuana bills.

Boston Highway

BOSTON (AP)- Boston's elevated Central Artery cannot be rerouted underground, the chairman of the legislature's Transportation Committee said yesterday.

Rep. Raymond F. Rourke, D-Lowell, said he had been told by a key figure in a study of the highway that it could not be put underground for engineering reasons.

Rourke did not name his informant nor elaborate on the reasons.

Alan Altschuler, the state's secretary of Transportation and construction, replied, "he hasn't told me about it. Maybe we ought to save our money for the study."

Altschuler was appearing before a hearing of Rourke's committee on Gov. Fraacis W. Sargent's bill to construct a third tunnel under Boston harbor between the Massachusetts Turnpike at South Station and Logan International Airport. The Two-lane, $200 million tunnel would be limited to buses, airport limousines, trucks and taxis.

The Boston Redevelopment authority has been studying for a month the idea of depressing the Central Artery. The study is to be completed in three to five months.

Canada trade study

PORTLAND, Maine (AP) - Participants in a conference aimed at boosting trade between New England and Eastern Canada submitted recommendations here today ranging from ways to steamline customs to developing a new regional energy policy.

The proposals were presented at a morning session by participants in eight workshops, each of which met Monday to explore aspects of trade and transportation between the two regions.

The conference is slated to wind up today.

Proposals submitted by the workshops included:

--The two regions have much in common and should launch a joint review of land use, land ownership and environmental protection and control.

--Set up an appropriate mechanism to remove the "red tape" associated with customs clearance between northern New England and Canada.

--Adopt uniform regulations concerning the most efficient truck sizes which could be allowed to operate on regional highways.

--Improve interregional rail transportation by achieving a faster turnaround of Canadian rail equipment circulating in the U.S.

--Coordinate airport planning between the northern New England states and Canadian officials to avoid unnecessary duplication of facilities on opposite sides of the border.

North Adams honored

NORTH ADMAS (AP) - North Adams has been selected as an All American City by the National Municipal League, according to the man who headed the city's entry committee.

Alan Marden, director of the Berkshire County Development Commission, made the announcement Tuesday to reporters. The official league announcement is scheduled for April 15.

The Dallas-based league selects 10 cities for the designation each year.

North Adams, with a population of about 19,000, was selected from among 495 entries and 18 finalists.

It is the only New England city cited this year.

Integration delay

BOSTON (AP) - The Boston School Committee plans to ask the state Supreme Judicial Court today for a delay in the scheduled September implementation in the state's racial balance plan for public schools.

U.S. District Court Judge W. Arthur Garrity Jr. refused a committee request Monday to reopen a federal discrimination case and to order a formal review of the state plan.

Two years ago, the national Association for the Advancement of Colored People filed suit charging the committee with denying black children equal educational opportunities under the U.S. Constitution.

A decision from Garrity on that case is pending.

SPRINGFIELD (AP) - William Robert Santinello, 30, of Chicopee has been sentenced in U.S. District Court here to 12 months in prison after pleading guilty to buying and receiving bogus money.

U.S. Atty. James N. Gabriel said Santinello was accused of buying and receiving $15,000 in counterfeit $20 Federal Reserve notes here in February of 1973.

Next U.S. President will be dark horse

By BILL PARENT

History makes men and history repeats itself.

As 1976 draws near and many changes occur on the political front, I believe that history will repeat itself once again and a hero will rise out of obscurity to save us all from the shame of the present administration, just as in 1932 when a partially crippled, assistant Secretary of the Navy, Franklin Roosevelt came forward to inherit the Presidency during a time of severe depression on false programs and promises of prosperity. Luckily for Roosevelt, Adolf Hitler invaded Poland and suddenly there were thousands of jobs and plenty of patriotism. The times made Roosevelt a reat leader, and, as economists predict better days coming toward the end of this decade, and the international relations show signs of improvement, the late seventies will probably produce a popular leader also. But the next President is probably not one of the so called "front-runners" in the papers today, the voting public is now distrustful and cynical to candidates being sold to them. All the present favorites seem to be lacking something.

First of all, the Republicans don't have much hope. Their only hope is Gerald Ford, and Gerald Ford's only hope is that he becomes President this summer and the economy and the press make radical turnabouts, but this is very unlikely. Lowell Weiker could never be President because he comes off as too much of a political opportunist and he seriously looks too much like Rodney Dangerfield..

George Wallace and his third party, in my opinion, will not be able to muster enough support to take an election. Remember, it was a little more than a short decade ago that he stood on the steps of the University of Alabama and refused to allow a black man to gain admission. Also I find Wallace in the heat of a campaign not to be at all charismatic figure but rather an obnoxious politician preaching facism to win a mandate. No, the sympathy of the wheelchair will not be enough and I doubt his acupuncture treatment cleared out his racist ideology.

The Democrats have the best chance, but not with the current line of potential candidates. Walter Mondale is already boring people in New Hampshire which is a trick in itself. The party could never get away with following George McGovern with Henry Jackson, the Pentagons' friend; that would be too drastic a change in party policy, (even though that term itself is a myth) it would be too much of a contradiction. Ted Kennedy could probably win an election but there are too many factors against him governing effectively. Sadly, there is always going to be Chappiquidik and rumors about his personal life. Also there is his own safety as a Kennedy. Anyway I don't think that the country could possibly fall into the Cape Cod Camelot of the early sixties again so soon. Finally, young hopefuls like Julian Bond will only have a slight chance because the people will probably be leaning to those candidates with years of Constitutional experience.

So who is going to be President?

As I said, the next President is probably pretty much unknown but as names appear in the next year there are a few traits to be watched for. The next President is going to have to be very close to the people, very plain spoken in the Truman style. He will also have to have a clean political character to follow the Nixon Administration. If Ed Muskie had waited a few years to come out of the Maine woods he could have probably made it on the Abraham Lincoln image but when he broke under the pen of William Loeb he lost the faith of the peonle. The next President will probably be older too, a man with a keen sense of history like Woodrow Wilson. On the Bi-Centennial election people will be examining closely how candidates interpret and stand for the Constitution. The election will not be one of issue but of edeology, campaign speeches will often sound like history classes with frequent quotes from the Constitution and the Federalist Papers.

In conclusion I don't know if such a man exists; at this time there are no hopefuls who fufill enough of these requirements. Therefore I think (and hope) that someone will rise out of obscurity and restore the honor of the Presidency as the country slowly begins to regain the faith and patriotism that has been taken away.

C.C. needs think tank

To The Editor:

Along with our current shortage of office space, classroom space, study space, eating space in the Hatch, drinking space in the Coffee Shop and standing space on the main level of the Campus Center. I know that Freud discovered psychoanalysis while sitting on the john and that Martin Luther formulated the principles of the Reformation while stowed away in the privy, and it's not that I meant to cut short anyone's researches but please, people, shit and get off the pot.

Look before leaping

To The Editor:

There seems to be a mass response to Mark Dugloszs' letter "Umass dating dull". I would like to throw in another male opinion if I may. In yesterdays Collegian, Miss Grasso shot a few rounds of her own ammunition in offense of some of the critical views Mark pointed out. I believe some of what Mark said and some of what Gail said, but I think that there was a major war in session between the two as well as the fact that they were both generalizing too much. I do believe that most girls here at Umass are here to "make their own start in life", and while us guys walk around half dressed with the smell of marijuana eluminating over us, we too are here in hopes of applying our knowledge towards a start in life. I would like to ask Gail where she has been looking lately? I am unattached to any one girl, but I have tried to dat a few girls here and have failed big. There is too damn much of this "Oh, he's not very good looking", or "Her body ain't bad, but her face sucks". I thought we left all that in highschool..I have all but given up on girls with their playing hard to get acts, and I am quite sure many other guys will agree with me. I do go to the various parties on campus and I see an awful lot of girls mingling amoungst the guys with the "long disheveled hair, flannel shirts, and ripped jeans". I greatly respect Gail's opinion as well as Mark's, but please, both of you, look before you leap..

Stolen cars and bikes?

To The Editor:

I was appalled to see the following ad in your classified section recently: "Need capable person to do English paper based on specific plays to be read. Have 1½ months, will pay well! Call Billy, 549,0130."

Unfortunately, it does not surprise me that students seek others to do their academic work for them — but it does surprise me that any individual would have the audacity to admit to such a practice in this way — and that it is consistent with Collegian policy to accept such advertisements.

If this is indeed your policy, perhaps you should consider capitalizing on it further. Why not run a whole section of advertisements of this type? One column could be devoted exclusively to the purchase and sale of term papers; another could be reserved for students who are willing to pass copies of exams on to others who will take them later. You will undoubtedly need space for those who wish to hire someone to complete an entire degree program in their name — after all, why should someone with money spend four years in dull Amherst when the same goal can be accomplished by proxy?

And while you're at it, how about a "STOLEN CARS AND BICYCLES" section?

OHAG to have rerun

To The Editor:

Last Wednesday evening, March 13, 1974; Orchard Hill Area Government Presidential and Vice-Presidential elections were held. The names of two candidates appeared on the ballot for the office of President, although one candidate had "unofficially" withdrawn before the election. Only one person ran for the office of Vice-President.

In order for the election to be valid, The Orchard Hill Area Government Constitution requires that 45 per cent of the residents must vote. Only 39 per cent of the 1200 residents did vote, and of these 580 votes, 50 were abstentions. As secretary of OHAG, I tended the ballot box in Field House and found that most of the residents refused to vote because they did not know the candidates. I believe that this refusal shows that the students do wish to be informed and do wish to vote responsibly.

It is the responsibility of the candidates to reach the people. The ONLY campaign information provided to the Orchard Hill community was a notice posted in each bathroom saying;

"We are in the RUNNING,
Help us STREAK to Victory."

and the names of one Presidential candidate and of the only Vice-Presidential candidate.

The candidates did not campaign. Perhaps they didn't feel the need to, but the voters, and even more importantly, the NON-voters have made it evident that they can fight apathetic candidates with apathy.

Now that the election is over the candidate, acting as interim President, has come out in support of a controversial platform that he felt no need to make public before the election It is clear that the candidates must be more responsible to the students.

In view of the poor turn-out, Area Government has voted to conduct another election. The nominations for President and Vice-President are now open to the Hill community. The election will be held April 10, 1974. Nomination papers are due April 7. For more information about the duties, benefits, and salaries of these positions, contact the Orchard Hill Area Government office, 103 Dickenson, 5-2680.

Sig Ep thanks UMass

To The Editor:

On behalf of the brothers of Sigma Phi Epsilon, I would like to thank the UMass community for their generous support of our efforts to raise money for research into muscular dystrophy. Your generosity has enabled us to raise over $600.

I would also like to thank the sisters of Chi Omega and Kappa Alpha Theta for their help in collecting on campus. You put in a lot of time and we appreciate it.

Will social service suffer setbacks?

To The Editor:

Tonight the Student Senate will be debating passage of a bill designed to cut the budget of the majority of social action RSO groups on campus.

A Collegian investigative reporter has determined that the Senate, using the rationale that the budget is bloated and "something has to give," is expected to cut those programs which direct student expertise toward offcampus targets.

Programs such as the Northampton Volunteers, Boltwood, J.O.E. and M.A.R.Y. train several hundred students on campus and have an immeasurable effect on the populations they serve, but have been designated low priority programs and can be expected to suffer.

The Northampton Volunteers, operating on a shoestring, has been cut twice in the past two years and a further cut could conceivably terminate the organization.

The University is committed to progressive social action, and upon hearing of the Senate action, Chancellor Bromery reaffirmed his support of that commitment. We ask the same support from the University body, and especially from those hundreds of students who will be affected. Write a letter to the editor. Contact your senator. And make it if you can to the Senate meeting tonight at 7 on the lower level of the Campus Center to express support for your organization to the Senate.

A modest proposal

Like so many of our fellow UMies, we went down to New York City last weekend to see the National Invitational Tournament, Madison Square Garden's annual gala debauchery. The dichotomy between the rolling lazy plains of Western Mass and the imposing gargantuans of New Yorks's "Concrete Jungle" as Tarzan like to say, was perhaps too great to absorb in one day. Nevertheless there we were carousing and gallivanting about The City's major thouroughfares and hobnobing thru its millions. Millions of lechers, businessmen, derelicts housewives, drunks, students, prostitutes, junkies and drunken UMies. We always thought Southwest was debilitating, but next to Co-Op City and Manhattan's maze Southwest seemed as homey as, say Turner's Falls. And we knew that the UMies from Southwest were no doubt as happy as a "pig in shit."

After the debacle (a Kellyism to be sure), the neighborhood about the Garden was flooded with UMies. But they were of the drunken, screaming, rowdy Fraternity and Sorority jock and jockette types for the most part. One "dude" did a slow strip tease and perversion act. Several other enthusiastic sorts engaged in banging on cars, pulling off the chrome and hubcaps and arguing with the New York Pigs who came "to the rescue." And the rest seemed content to mill about McAnn's or go barhopping the area proclaiming to the World and New York City that they were a healthy repressntation of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. Many to be fair did behave with all of the sense and aplomb that Randolph Bromery and Eric Walgren would admire, but the majority thought it was Saturday night at the Bluewall or at some Frat party and made classical asses of themselves.

Being a journalist of the investigative (if not inflammatory) bent, I whipped out a piece of pencil and a paper and interviewed one of the locals, walking by glazed eyed and staring wondrously at the shimmering throng.

Z.N.: "Excuse me sir! Excuse me! Would you answer a few questions? No I m not going to mug you, I just want to talk to you for a minute."

Bystander: "Uh, OK! Say whats all this anyway. A Young Republicans Convention?"

Z.N.: "No, this is the UMass Defeat Celebration. You see we played Jacksonville in the NIT tonight but we lost. Anyways these people are out here getting drunk despite it and celebrating."

Bystander: "Strange way to be celebrating. Do they always party like this wherever you come from?"

Z.N.: "Pretty much all the time. Some hang out of our 28 story Library (I said 28 trying to sound impressive as Hell) and some spend their leisure hours chasing fires and Amherst Towing trucks. Others vegetate and wish they were in the School of Ed. And others streak thru the Infirmary yelling "I'm sick! I'm sick!"

Bystander: "That's very interesting. But where I come from we have a way of dealing with such rowdies and troublemakers."

Z.N.: "How's that?"

Bystander: "We call it our "Modest Proposal" Program. You see we take all of those causing mayhem-the drunks, the rowdies, the junkies, the fools, idiots and perverts-all of which abound in this group. We take these people to the outskirts of town and shoot one out of every five. We then use their bodies in Food For The Poor programs, thus recycling the trash."

Z.N.: "What! Thats Horrible! How can you suggest such a thing. Where are you from.....Argentina?"

Bystander: "Well you won't have any trouble anymore I'll guarantee you that!"

Z.N. "We won't have any jocks anymore either. Hmmm.....Say whats your name anyway, buddy?"

Bystander: "Frank Rizzo, and yours?"

Z.N.: "AAAGGGHHH!!!"

OH! THE PAIN OF IT ALL!

No crush for GOP

Those of us who expect a disaster for the Republican party in the November elections will probably be disappointed. Even with Richard Nixon in the White House the GOP will not be wiped out.

First, let's look at the Senate elections. There are thirty-four seats up for bid this year; the Democrats hold twenty and the Republicans fourteen. Some of the Democrats are in trouble even before the election begins; Senator Mike Gravel (D-Alas) will probably not return. If he survives the primary battle he will still have to overcome a serious GOP contender (perhaps Wally Hickel former Secretary of the Interior). Sen. J. William Fulbright (D-Ark) will face a primary fight against Governor Dale Bumpers. Fulbright took an anti-Israeli position during the October War and will probably suffer as a result. Senators Hughes (D-Iowa) and Ervin (D-NC) are leaving of their own free will, Ervin to fish Hughes to preach. Iowa is not exactly a Democratic State; it voted for Richard Nixon almost two to one in 1972. North Carolina was once part of the solid south; in 1968 and 1972 it voted for Nixon; last year it elected a Republican Senator and in 1970 a GOP governor. Two other Democrats will face an uphill battle, George McGovern and Thomas Eagleton. Eagleton was hurt by his aborted Vice-Presidential bid and McGovern was likewise damaged by the 1972 elections. One way McGovern had managed to get re-elected in Republican South Dakota was to pay special attention to his state but during the Presidential election he was unable to do so.

On the Republican side Nixon foes such as Jacob Javits (R-NY), Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz), Charles Mathais (R-MD) and Richard Schweiker (R-Penn) are running for re-election this year. It will be difficult to punish them for a close association with Richard Nixon because one doesn't exist. The only way they could be hurt by Watergate is if the voters turn their rath against all Republicans or all incumbents. There are a few Republicans who are in serious danger, however. Senator Gurney of the Watergate Committee fame is involved in a scandal in his home state. Senator Robert Dole (R-Kan) will suffer because he was the GOP chairman at the time of the Watergate break in. At least two Republicans will not take their seats in the Senate again next year. George Aiken of Vermont and Norris Cotton of New Hampshire have announced their intentions to retire. New Hampshire may elect a Democratic Senator but even if they do the chances of a liberal being elected are about zero. Vermont will probably not elect a Democrat; even though they have a governor from that party. Philip Hoff ran a strong campaign in 1970 but lost and he was one of the most popular Democrats in the state's recent history.

Usually in a Presidential election year when the President wins a landslide victory he carries members of his own party into the House of Representatives. These new representatives are often defeated at the next election because they do not have the President's coattails to ride on. For instance in 1938 after FDR's landslide the Democrats lost seventy-one seats in 1966 after LBJ's landslide they lost forty-seven representatives. In 1972 Richard Nixon didn't carry many of his party into the House, the Republican share of the lower branch of the Congress increased by only thirteen. So we can't expect the great loss of seats that usually follows a landslide victory by the President. Looking at the local situation only one Republican from Massachusetts has allied himself closely to the President, Paul Cronin of Andover. Representatives Conte and Heckler (the only other Republicans from Massachusetts in the House) have kept their distance from Mr. Nixon.

The Republicans will lose Representatives and Senators in the next election, but it will not be a crushing defeat. They just don't have that many seats to lose.

Good students don't do that

By BARBARA VOORHEES

Imbeciles. A room full of imbeciles.

That's what Dr. Saul Balagura, UMass professor, of psychology called his Emotion and Motivation class regularly last semester, usually every Monday, Wednesday and Friday. Variations on this insult included asking individual class members to stand up so that he could make fools out of them in front of the class and telling class members that he never wanted to see their faces at his door or hear their voices on the phone because he had teaching assistants to answer their stupid questions.

The class reacted by sitting and smiling at each insult, proving his point. Only one person walked out during the entire semester.

What training! In the 12-16 years these people had been in school they had learned well that they should put up with anything in order to get a good grade.

From the time we urinated and defecated in our pants because we were afraid to ask their permission to go to the toilet until the present when we rush around and do the assignments they give us over "vacation", teachers have controlled a good hunk of our lives.

And you probably never even thought about it. But then we never did have much time or encouragement for thought of our own.

First grade teachers are substitute mothers. (How many of you had a male first grade teacher?) They don't love each student. They do, however, determine which students are "good" and which are "bad."-delete

First grade teachers are substitute mothers. (How many of you had a male first grade teacher?) They don't love each student. They do, however, determine which students are "good" and which are "bad." And each student works his or her little ass off to do what it takes to make this new Mommy respect him or her.

The student meets a long series of these judges during his schooling. Each judge is different and has a different set of criteria to be conformed to. Seldom do you find a judge who respects his students for acting and thinking on their own.

Psychological studies show that most teachers base their decisions on who is "good" or who is best-looking or whose parents make the most money. With this as a basis the teacher can determine who is the "best" by determining which good-looking, financially well-off students conform to the teacher's criteria for performance.

The student spends a good deal of his waking hours in school or doing homework. His self concept is molded by his teachers. Just who is a teacher that he should be in such a position?

College professors are supposed to be different. Many are and encourage students to act and think on their own. They may even make this part of their criteria for "good " students. By this time it's almost too late, Students will do anything for the good grades that mean they are "good" but they can't act on their own.

Friends who have recently become elementary school teachers tell me how they love the cute little boys and girls in their classes, but dislike those who are not always clean and neat. And they tell me how threatening their students with bad grades is sometimes not a good form of discipline. If it does not make the students do what they "should" they must sit with their heads down on their desks for hours on end.

It is a vicious cycle.

Letters Policy

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian welcomes all letters to the editor. They must be signed, and include the author's address and phone number. Also, all letters must be typed, double-spaced, at sixty spaces per line, and no more than two pages.

Organizations may submit letters, but they must include a name and phone number for reference purposes.

All letters are subject to editing, for either content or space, according to the judgement of the editors. Due to space limitations, there is no guarantee that all letters received will be printed.

'Corp' calls MDC 'racist paper'

There are those who would try to label the actions that will be taken by Corp. against the Collegian as a belated reaction. Their rationale for this is that the Collegian has always been a racist newspaper reflecting the closed views of White America. Why is it they rhetorically ask, didn't black students take the necessary action against the Collegian before? Our answer is, that there is a time and place for everything and that time has arrived. We recognize the fact that the Collegian is run by white students whose interest is diametrically opposed to that of the Black students. Hence one cannot really expect that the Collegian with its present staff to respectfully, accurately or sensitively report news affecting the Black community here at UMass.

This is not a new phenomenon. In fact the Collegian in the past had to be physically forced to report "Black news". When there was the killing at Southern University, Black students had to occupy the Collegian Office and force them to report this event. The Collegian did not think it necessary to react with the degree of intensity when fellow Black college students are gunned down by their white fathers, as they did during the Kent State killing.

When C.C.E.B.S. had their banquet on October 20th the Collegian refused to cover the event. "We don't have anyone to cover it was their reply." The staff was out making bon fires along with the other strange things they involve themselves in. To them, it wasn't important. They didn't consider that there was a Black and Third World Community interested in such events.

When two sisters, Theresa Cooper and Bridget Porter were attacked by a couple of intoxicated white boys, the Collegian came out with a very distorted version of the event, making the victims - the sisters, appear to be the aggressors, and the aggressors - the victims. Is this the action of a responsible press? Or does the Collegian owe responsibility only to the white community. And the recent conflict in the Middle East; we saw how you reported that also—Israel the good guys and the Arabs the bad guys. The Oil Crisis in America-yea, we hear you echo the cry of an "Arab Blackmail". We know about those mines in South Africa where our Sister and Brothers are being enslaved. Yea, we know that one of Israel's chief industry is diamond cutting and polishing. The link is quite obvious.

If the Collegian is responsible and democratic, then we challenge them to show it via their journalism. That's the only criteria by which we can judge them.

These are not isolated cases. This in fact has been the attitude of the Collegian since its existence. Then comes the McGilvray cartoon. After systematically keeping Black people out of the news, the Collegian decides that it is time to make fun of Black people, presupposing that "Niggers" are docile enough to sit still and let whites make fun of them. And the Collegian editors had the audacity to be echoing the cry for freedom of the press when they were unable to predict the actions of Blacks. In fact, this has always been cover for the editors of the Collegian. Whenever the Collegian prints material that is considered irresponsible or slanderous the editors try to cover the issues under the shroud of "fredom of the press".

When letters came pouring in, in protest to the McGilvray's cartoon depicting Chancellor Bromery as a cooning Negro, the editors responded — "There is no censorship in a free and democratic press." Continuing further they assert - we will however uphold our cartoonists or any other person's right to express an opinion in his own way on these pages." - even if they insult and damage a people's character.

We exist in an institution of higher learning, where theoretically, we should be working to alleviate some of the ills that afflict this society. Racism is a cancer afflicting white America. One would assume that a responsible and democratic press would not serve as an organ of racial animosity. But, instead the Collegian is proud to be the organ through which institutionalized racism is propagated.

If the editors of the Collegian and McGilvray do not see the cartoon as racist, we pity them; they being products of this sick environment. Racism is a matter of ingrained traditional attitudes conditioned through institutions. For some it is a natural reflex as breathing. We will make the Collegian editors and McGilvray control their breathing if necessary because the days of the old cooning Negro is over!!!

There are three categories of white racist. The overt, self satisfied racist who doesn't attempt to hide his antipathy; the self-interdicting racist who harbors and nurtures racism in spite of his best efforts, and the unconscious racist, who has no awareness of his racist preconceptions. If the editors of the Collegian and McGilvray fall into the last category, then we will enlighten them. For one of our duties here is to serve as the catalyst of change. We hence render our services.

The tenure debate

Union College tries the contract

What is tenure? Who gets it? Why have it? Critics say tenure -- guaranteeing employment to professors after seven years of teaching, scholarship and public service -- limits flexibility in staffing and stifles natural drifts in academic disciplines. Supporters hail it as an essential and appropriate way o guarantee freedom of expression for University professors.

Today The Collegian prints the first of three brief essays on the nature of tenure, in an effort to describe its benefits and liabilities for students and stake out the areas of disagreement between UMass faculty and administrators.

Today William F. Enteman, provost of Union College in Schenectady, N.Y. discusses that College's "contract system" with faculty, which replaces the permanency of tenure with contracts that the college may choose not to renew. Provost Enteman's paper was written especially for The Collegian.

The Union College Tenure Plan was adopted as a particular institutional response to a set of conditions. Perhaps the most important condition was the recognition that Union should not plan to grow in size for the foreseeable future (at least one decade, probably two decades, beyond that no one can project with any reliability). It is clear that within that period, student interests will change from one discipline or set of disciplines to another. If the curriculum were unable to shift in response to those needs, it would become irrelevant and uninteresting. The existence of a tenure system in itself does not preclude the necessary flexibility. However, if too high a proportion of faculty were on tenure (i.e. virtually permanent-to-retirement contracts) within a discipline or within the college at large, the requisite flexibility might be lost. Faculty are not like bricks, one cannot be replaced by another without concern for their knowledge and abilities. If fewer students want to study courses in X and would rather study courses in Y, one cannot generally expect the professors of X to start being professors of Y. If students want to learn Y, we should not tell them it is just as well to learn X. Nor can we tell them to withhold those interests in Y until enough of the professors of X retire so that we can hire additional professors of Y.

The issue, then, is how high a proportion of tenured faculty is too high. That seems to me to be a particular instituional decision which would depend upon many factors. Clearly 0 per cent is enough flexibility and 100 per cent is insufficient in a no-growth-in-size situation. At Union, we settled on saying no more than 60 per cent of the total faculty will be on tenure with allowances up to 65 per cent for individual departments. There is no magic in those numbers; someone else might have chosen another set; other institutions might well find another set more appropriate.

One must be careful not to play fast and loose with tenure. It was designed to fulfill a purpose, and it has done so over the years. Its purpose was to protect the academic freedom of individual professors so that they would be free to explore the frontiers of learning and present the results of those explorations to students and a broader public. A college without sufficient academic freedom (and, I would argue, freedom guaranteed by a system, not merely by the good faith of administrators and governing boards) will come to a similar end as a college without sufficient curricular flexibility (and flexibility guaranteed by a system, not merely hope and good wishes). Both will atrophy.

As far as I know, no one has ever argued that the only way a college can have sufficient protection for academic freedom is by having 100 per cent of its faculty on tenure. Even the AAUP system does not require that. Consequently, we asked what proportion would be essential as a minimum to sustain a critical mass of tenured faculty ready to defend academic freedom if either theirs or the freedom of their non-tenured colleagues should be threatened. We settled on 33 per cent. Here, again, different people and different institutions might adopt some other percentage.

Two features of the Union College Tenure Plan are, then, clear: we have established a "floor" and a "ceiling" within which tenure proportions must range. We were left with one major problem: the AAUP tenure system required that by the end of a faculty member's sixth year of service, we must tell him or her one of two things -- either tenure would be granted or the person would have to leave Union. This "tenure or out" policy threatened to force us to dismiss some highly qualified junior faculty. We were stuck. The flexibility principle and the freedom principle and the "tenure or out" principle. However, we wanted to keep one feature of the "tenure or out" system: that by the end of the sixth year a very carful, thorough and challenging review would be taken of each junior faculty member to determine if he or she should be continued at Union.

Our system, then, boils down to this: (1) A committee structure meets to plan and determine where faculty positions are available and which should be allowed to become tenure positions (under the 60 per cent - 65 per cent and 33 per cent constraints) irrespective of whether there are people ready to fill those positions. (2) A separate committee structure meets to pass judgment on the qualifications of junior faculty. This committee now decides not whether the person should receive tenure, but whether the person is "tenurable" (i.e. meets all the qualifications necessary for tenure at Union). If the person is deemed not tenurable, he or she is dismissed. If the person is deemed tenurable and if there is a tenure position open, the person is granted tenure. If the person is deemed tenurable and if there is no tenure position open, the person may be offered long term contracts. (3) A "grandfather clause" protects all those currently on tenure.

As I said at the outset, this is a system a particular institution adopted. It may not be appropriate for the University of Massachusetts. The principles are universal, we should all face them. Particular responses may vary. Benign neglect is a cop-out.

Contractor held in in Kronholm case

MINNEAPOLIS, Minn. (AP) — A Lakeville, Minn., housing contractor was arraigned yesterday and held on $100,000 bond in connection with the Eunice Kronholm kidnaping. Mrs. Kronholm was in seclusion with her family Tuesday after her 3½-day ordeal.

The FBI said it was still looking for the $200,000 ransom that Gunnar Kronholm, a South St. Paul banker, paid for the release of his wife. Authorities also searched for other suspects.

A family spokesman said Mrs. Kronholm, 46, would discuss her ordeal at a news conference Wednesday.

James Wayne Johnson, 35, appeared with his attorney, Ronald Meshbesher, before U.S. Magistrate J. Earl Codd in Minneapolis. A preliminary hearing on a charge of extorting $200,000 from the Drovers State Bank was set for next Tuesday.

Johnson told the court he is married and the father of three children. He said his only previous court appearance was in connection with late support payments to an ex-wife.

Mrs. Kronholm walked into a grocery store in Burnsville late Monday afternoon and made a telephone call to her husband.

The FBI would not say whether she had been released or escaped.

Asst. U.S. Dist. Atty. Thor Anderson said Johnson had been seen by FBI agents at a telephone booth in suburban Richfield about 6 p.m., Sunday, after a trace was put on a phone call to Kronholm giving ransom instructions. The agents followed Johnson to his home about 15 miles south.

Mrs. Kronholm disappeared Friday morning while en route from her Line Lakes home to an appointment with a hair dresser.

Angry cameraman becomes hero; stops robbery

MEMPHIS, Tenn. (AP(- A news cameraman says he acted out of "sheer anger" when he rammed his car into another car carrying three bank robbers and two hostages.

His action halted a chase which ended in death for one of the three gunmen Monday. Two policemen were injured in the incident.

Bill Anderson, 27, of WHBQ-TV, who was filming the pursuit of the robbers, said he was enraged when he saw the getaway vehicle run down a policeman dashing across a department store parking lot.

"I saw him hit that police officer and knock him 15 feet and I just lost control," said Anderson. "I ducked down and floored it and rammed their car...and I stayed ducked down while the shooting was going on."

Police said one of the gunmen, Clyde M. Hyde Jr., 43, Shreveport, La., killed himself with a shot in the chest when officers encircled the getaway car. The other robbers released two women hostages and surrendered. A third hostage had been released earlier to tell police to stop the chase, authorities said.

The officer hit by the getaway car, Benjamin Payne, 28, suffered a broken back and was hospitalized in satisfactory condition.

Police earlier had trapped the robbers inside a suburban branch of Union Planters National Bank after the holdup men scooped up $49,778. But police kept their distance when the trio emerged with the hostages, all bank employes, and drove off in a car commandered from another bank employee.

1000 watts of power -- radiated from the transmitting tower atop Emily Dickinson House in Orchard Hill.

ENGINEERING CENTER W. M. U. A.

WMUA is the University's radio station. Most people know that. But that's all some people know about the station. For all you who fit into this category, we'd like to tell you more.

For those of you who like numbers: WMUA operates at 91.1 on the FM dial with 1000 watts of radiating power; it has a range of 20 to 25 miles, which means its broadcasts can be normally heard as far away as Chicopee and Holyoke. On rare occasions, the station has been heard in Albany, New York City and further south. Broadcasts were first heard back in 1949, which makes WMUA one of the oldest noncommercial college stations in the United States. Today, the offices and studios are located in Marston Hall, which is just west of the Graduate Research Center, next to "6" lot. The transmitter is located in a seventh floor room in Emily Dickinson House, with the fifty foot antenna streching toward the sky from the roof of the same.

Listen to the music....while the large percentage of the music heard on the air is progressive rock and jazz, samplings of all types of music can be heard throughout the day, whether it be rock, soul, blues, or even top 40. A record library continaining over 15,000 albums is used in the selection of the music to be played; the disc jockeys have free run in exercising their personal tastes for records to be aired.

Of course, music does not occupy 100 per cent of the station's air-time. Local and National news, sports, and weather reports are presented. Public Affairs programs such as live and taped coverage of important speakers in the Amherst area, "Off the Hook", and the Womens' Show are regularly heard, as well as the popular late night serial, "Moon Over Morocco."

I talked with Gary McAuliffe, the chief engineer of the station. Gary is a junior Mass Communications major from Worcester. The position of chief engineer, as well as the station manager, program director, news director, and others, is a paid position. Gary is paid for seventeen hours a week, although he spends at least twice that amount of time working at the station. When he's not putting in his 35-plus hours a week there, and also being a student, Gary can be found working at any one of the various radio and television stations in the Springfield area. Gary expressed optimism for the station in general, but noted a few problems hampering the station's progress, not the least of which is a lack of space and working room. The entire operation of the station is controlled from seven small rooms in Marston Hall, a total of 1400 square feet; Gary stated that an expansion to an area of at least 3500 square feet would be a desirable more. You know things are tight when the AP and UPI wire machines are kept in an old bathroom.

The second problem is the drop in student involvement at WMUA. Although the staff numbers about fifty, this is not enough; "People are not joining like they used to," remarked McAuliffe. He expressed a desire for people to come down to Marston, take a look around, and see what they could do. Some people don't know where the studios are located; Lori Kessler said that when she first decided to work at WMUA, she went over to the WFCR station across from Southwest. So, if you think you've got something to offer, take a walk over to Marston, and check it out. They're looking for d.j.'s, newsmen, and all sorts of other help; it's all volunteer work, but if you think you cut it in front of a few thousand radio listeners, give it a shot! You'll never know unless you try.

Soviet rights panel appeals to students

Dear Friend:

In the many memoirs written by former inmates of Soviet forced labor camps who reached safety in the West, one theme comes up again and again. Those who stayed behind, plead with the lucky ones: "Please, do not forget -- do not forget to tell the West!" Evidently, they hoped fervently for some kind of help from the people in free countries, once their story became known.

Most of the escapees did not forget, and did tell the West. However, the Western public generally reacted with helpless embarrassment: "What can we do?" Then, in the late 'fifties and 'sixties, when the horrible system of forced labor camps was reduced in scope, the urgency of such help seemed to diminish. It was hoped that the totalitarian regime would become progressively more liberal all by itself. People did not realize that the regime would try to reorganize its controls, make them more subtle and more efficient, and enlist the deep feelings of Russian patriotism for its own purposes. Thus, the Soviet regime became actually stronger and more dangerous to the rest of the world.

Now, a new wave of appeals from Soviet citizens has been reaching the West, with new desperate pleas for help. This time, a new note is added: It is not their own plight alone which moves them, but also their anguish concerning the dangers to world peace posed by the increased power of the Soviet regime.

This time, we ought to respond. A group of members of the campus community have joined as individuals, to form a Committee for Human Rights in the Soviet Area with that purpose in mind. They are determined to try to disprove the notion that Americans are helpless and must watch passively what is happening to people in the Soviet area and what this development does in the long run to our own security.

The members of the Committee are, of course, just as concerned with oppression under authoritarian regimes in other parts of the globe. On humanitarian grounds, they all have an equal claim to our attention. We chose to concentrate on the Soviet area because of a special political priority, since the Soviet regime deeply affects the rest of the world and its security.

As a first step, the founding group of the Committee has prepared a statement of the issues to be sent as an open letter to all members of the U.S. Congress, and to be published as a paid advertisement in The Daily Collegian, and possibly in other papers.

We ask you to support that statement (see enclosed sheet) by attaching your signature on the rider below, and to send a financial contribution to defray the cost of the advertisement and expenses connected with printing, mailing, distribution, and further activities aimed at wider dissemination of our message.

Using small claims court

Mass PIRG reports

By STEVE DeLANCEY

—Last week: Mass PIRG Reports previewed Ralph Nader's UMass visit, gave some facts about nuclear power plants, and reviewed MassPIRG's response to the planned construction of twin-reactors in Montague.—

About a year and a half ago, MassPIRG began researching the use (and apparant lack of use) of the Small Claims Courts in Massachusetts. It found that though the Small Claims Court had originally been set up as a people's court, it was being used essentially as a collection agency for companies and landlords.

Use of the Small Claims Court can help a citizen avoid the hassle and expense of hiring a lawyer and filing a formal lawsuit. Yet it is an effective and relatively quick way to settle common financial disputes. The failure to make use of this system was caused by two things: First, very few people realized that such a court existed. Second, the mystique surrounding the legal system, lawsuits, and court actions has always discouraged the citizen from taking action on what might appear to be a minor problem.

MassPIRG's effort was designed to return the Small Claims Court to the people and remove some of the mystery shrouding the legal system. MassPIRG printed a booklet 'How To Sue In Small Claims Courts' and established a Small Claims Citizen Advisory Service. They have distributed over three thousand copies of that booklet to students, consumers, and the growing advisory service is now in its second year of operation.

'How To Sue In Small Claims Courts' was written by Pam Benepe (currently MassPIRG's student coordinator) and printed in January of 1973. It explains in simple terms what Small Claims Courts are, how they operate, when they may be used, and how one goes about filing a claim. It also offers some helpful hints on preparation for the hearing. At the end of the booklet a section of appendicies lists the hours, locations, and jurisdictions of each district court in western Mass. and contains examples of summons, subpoena, and suit forms.

You may use the Small Claims Court if you think that another person or a business owes you money. The types of cases that are heard in such a court run from landlord-tenant disputes to faculty or overcharged repair work to complaints about appliances that break down shortly after they are purchased. The claim must be made for cash (you can't ask for services or products), and cannot exceed $400.00. The suit is filed in the district where the person or business being sued is located.

To begin the suit action, you go to the particular district court and give the small claims clerk all pertinent information. The clerk then gives you a hearing date — usually two to six weeks in the future — and tells you how to prepare for the hearing. A fee of about $3.50 is charged to cover court costs. If you win the suit, that fee is refunded with your settlement. The defendant is then sent an official summons by registered mail requiring him to appear at the hearing.

At the hearing, the judge informally hears both sides of the story, asks questions, and examines any evidence and witnesses. It is encouraged that all pertinent facts be brought up and freely discussed at this time. When the judge is satisfied that he has heard all the facts, he terminates the hearing. Both parties are notified of his decision by mail in about a week's time.

If the judge rules in your favor, the court orders that the money be paid to you. If the payment cannot be made in one lump sum, the court works out a payment schedule. If the defendant still refuses to pay, the court has the power to issue an execution order to be delivered by a sheriff to the defendant. The sheriff is legally able to collect your money for you.

In return for the inexpensive and speedy justice that a Small Claims Court affords, the person who uses it automatically gives up his right to a trial by jury and to his right of appeal.

The first Small Claims Citizen Advisory Service offices were instituted last year by Patty Hennesey, a Hampshire College student working with MassPIRG. Alan Lasher, a second year student at Western New England Law School, took over in January of this year as state-coordinator of the service. MassPIRG's staff attorney, Jonathan Souweine, assists in the effort. Run by student volunteers who learn the workings of the court through observation and workshops, the advisory service's foremost goal is to educate citizens to legal opportunities open to them.

Most advisory services in the state are run by students who work strictly on a volunteer basis — without receiving payment or academic credit. At UMass, however, the Outreach and Legal Studies programs have joined MassPIRG in creating the UMass Small Claims Court Project. This project offers academic credit for part-time or full-time interns and extends the concept of the advisory service into a full, practical learning experience.

Each student involved in the program is thoroughly trained so that he can explain the working of the Small Claims Court to interested citizens, or, if the situation demands, refer them to other agencies such as the Better Business Bureau or the Attorney General's office.

The interns also have individual projects of their own that relate to the advisory service. Some are involved in a media campaign (the Collegian runs public service ads for the group) to make people aware of their services. Others are researching how certain changes might be instituted within the courts, such as the scheduling of new hours. Small Claims court sessions often are held during the work day and a person is unable to include the lost day's pay in his suit.

The students keep journals to record their experiences with the community, the courts, and the judges. Documentation of the journal information will provide guidelines and directions for future interns.

To keep expenditures at a minimum, the advisory service attempts to work within the community through already existing agencies such as legal services and welfare agencies. The students explain the purpose of their venture and ask for part-time use of office space. If the agencies are hesitant, the students offer to train members of the agency or ask that citizens who have problems that might be worked out through the Small Claims Courts be referred to them for counselling.

Coordinator Lasher hopes "to make a state-wide network of the advisory services that pool experience, advice, and resources. I'd like this advisory service to be a good model for the state and the rest of the country."

The UMass branch of the Small Claims Citizen Advisory Service office is located in Room 413-E in the Student Union. The Amherst branch uses the MassPIRG office on North Pleasant Street.

The UMass Small Claims Court Project welcomes any volunteers who would like to get involved. Full-time, part-time, and summer internships are available. There are plans to offer legal education colloquium in the fall that will deal with Small Claims Court advising.

Moliere, mon ami

A production of Moliere's Les Fourberies de Scapin in French will be presented at 8 p.m. tonight and tomorrow in the Assembly Room of Converse Hall, Amherst College. The performance is open to the public without charge.

Sponsored by the College's departments of dramatic arts and French, the cast of students from colleges in the area will be directed by Mark Jaster, an Amherst freshman from Washington, D.C., and Amherst Associate Professor of French Richard Pini.

There is a tradition of theater in French at Amherst. Plays by Ionesco and Labiche were produced by the French department in the early 'Sixties, and French plays have been brought to Kirby Theater. Both departments, and particularly Visiting Professor of Dramatic Arts Allan Albert, believe that a student production in French is an important contribution towards the variety of theater experiences at the College.

Summer school

UMass Summer School, 1974 will be housed at Orchard Hill this year. There will be one session of eight weeks duration and will run from June 24 to August 16. He is located at 103 Grayson House and will be responsible for the Summer School Program on the Hill.

Application forms and related materials must be completed and returned to Appleby on or before April 1, 1974. Materials received after that date will not be considered.

Health Education

Oh, my aching back

According to University Health Services Physical Therapist, Marc Gelinas, at least 60 per cent of students will develop chronic or intermittent low back problems in their lifetime. At least 60 per cent of those problems could be entirely prevented by good posture and-or good body mechanics (The remaining number of lower back problems are as a result of trauma — car accidents, falls, sports injuries, etc. which are preventable in another sense.) These problems are about 58 per cent greater in men then women. As women become involved a wider range of activity options, the difference in incidence is decreasing. Perhaps these following few reminders will help you in focusing in on your daily habits and how you can prevent yourself from become a statistic!

When carrying a heavy weight, such as a suitcase, keep the back straight and the arms only slightly bent. Carry the weight slightly to one side compensating with your body weight by leaning in the opposite direction. If carrying a smaller weight, carry the object in bent arms and carry it close to your body. If pushing a heavy object, stand close to the object and crouch with legs apart, one in front of the other. Flex the elbows and put hands on the object at chest level. Lean forward so chest or shoulders touch the object keeping the back straight. Push be extending the legs, not the arms.

While lifting keep as much strain as possible off your back. Let your legs do the work. These are the largest muscles in your body. Keep the knees and hips bent and the back straight. Grasp near the center of the object and lift by pushing up with both legs. Keep the load close to your body but not above the waist. If stooping to lift, squat directly in front of the object and with feet apart one in front of the other, lower yourself by bending at the hips and knees keeping your back straight. Do this whether you are stooping for something as light as a pencil or as heavy as a box of books.

Posture is also important, and there are several ways to improve it. One is to sit so that your knees are higher than your hips. To do this you may use the chair in front of you or small foot stool. Try not to sit in the same position for prolonged periods. When driving, push the front seat of your car forward so your knees will be higher than your hips. If you work standing up, prop one foot up on a six inch stool. This flattens your back naturally.

Divorce laws under fire

By SETH MYDANS
Associated Press Writer

BOSTON (AP) - Massachusetts' century-old divorce laws, which have survived over 50 years of challenges, were once again to be the subject of 24 bills before the Judiciary Committee today.

"No-fault" divorce has been a hot issue on Beacon Hill for the past few years, but one of its backers, Rep. Barbara E. Gray, R-Framingham, gives it little chance of succeeding this year.

Mrs. Gray is one of several legislators sponsoring a measure that would establish "irreconcilable differences" as a grounds for divorce, and would change the laws on child custody.

Under the bill, coordinated by the Massachusetts Women's Lobby, both marriage partners would agree to separate on these grounds for a six-month trial period.

It would also set up a Family Review Board to determine child custody, currently in the hands of the judge.

Under current law, Massachusetts grants divorces only on seven specific grounds, including such charges as drunkenness, drug addiction, desertion and cruel and unusual treatment.

"There is a growing feeling that some kind of modernization is needed," Mrs. Gray said Monday. "Many other states have no-fault divorce now, including New Hampshire."

She said Massachusetts citizens are going to New Hampshire now for divorces, and others are forced to perjure themselves to meet Massachusetts' strict grounds.

Nobody goes to France just to ride the railroads.

But when the wise ones get there, and want to get from one place to the next, the way they get around is by train.

The fact is, French trains give you more than comfort and convenience, more than speed and a window on the world. They give you value. For even in a day when almost everything is going up except the dollar, French trains are still one of the greatest transportation buys in the world.

Because distances from Paris are short, French trains go everywhere. To the medieval mysteries of Vezelay (163 miles, $13.50) and Carcassonne (503 miles, $41.00). To the Provence of Gaughin and van Gogh (486 miles, $39.50). To the vineyards of the Cote d'Or (220 miles, $18.50) and the sparkling sun of the Cote d'Azur (660 miles, $53.50). To castles and cathedrals. To Alps and oceans. To monuments of the Romanesque and Renaissance. To all the hidden corners of a country haunted by history and enriched by centuries of civilization.

Paris, of course, is Paris. But France is more. And it's all connected by 25,000 miles of track, more than 4,000 stations, and many hundreds of sleek, swift trains that will pamper you, feed you, even bed you down. While they whisk you from here to anywhere in no more than a few relaxing hours.

So if you really want to see France, see France by train. And see how economical great travel can be. While you're at it, ask about our other travel bargains—a 1st Class Eurailpass, or the 2nd Class Student-Railpass. For tickets and reservations, get in touch with your travel agent, or nearest French National Railroads office, 610 Fifth Avenue, New York 10020; 11 East Adams Street, Chicago 60603; 9465 Wilshire Blvd., Beverly Hills 90212; 323 Geary St., San Francisco 94102; 2121 Ponce de Leon Blvd., Coral Gables 33134. Also in Toronto and Montreal.

Please send me literature describing how to get the most value out of my trip to France.

DC alumni pledge $10,500 in Phonothon

Last week in Washington, DC, UMass Alumni contributed $10,500 in pledges via that area's first Phonothon. Thirty-six alumni joined the Second Century Club with pledges of $100 or more.

Volunteers in Washington for the two nights of phoning included approximately 60 alumni ranging in class from 1934 to 1973, and 12 legislative interns in the Outreach Program.

At the same time alumni have been calling other alumni for pledges in a Phonothon in Hartford, Connecticut. Nearly $16,000 was pledged to 90 alumni volunteers in four nights.

Next on the agenda for alumni fund-raising is the second annual Boston-area Phonothon held in the Suburban Experiment Station in Waltham, Massachusetts. This project should bring 500 alumni together again to raise money for the Almuni Scholarship program, special academic programs and the library.

Last but by no means least will be the giant Student-Alumni Phonothon with 500 students phoning alumni over the country and particularly in New England. Calling will be done from thirty telephones installed in Memorial Hall. Phoning will be done in sixteen sessions with dinner and a complete briefing before.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Some relationships are tested. You may be finishing rather than beginning a project. Now you find out where you stand, who is a friend or otherwise. Accent sociability. Be gregarious without being foolish. Member of opposite sex may be in fighting mood."

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You are challenged. Best course now is to assert desires, needs, ambitions. Get it out on table—don't play games with one who talks but does something entirely different. You have right to answers. Be mature and be sure you are treated with dignity.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Lunar aspect highlights reaching beyond what is an apparent limitation. Your intuition works overtime. You teach, learn and perceive potential. Aquarian could play key role. Refuse to be bogged down by associate who brookds, sings blues and constantly complains.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Someone wants to play fast and loose--with your money. Draw line. Have fun without being foolishly extravagant. Promises made should be backed by collateral. Otherwise, you risk losing money and friendship. Be realistic and be sure others live up to obligations.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Slow pace. Look around—find out how green grass actually is elsewhere. Talk matters over with partner, mate. If contract is in question, get expert legal counsel. Details are more important now than in recent past.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Health, work, how you relate to associates—these are spotlighted. Changes occur. Dialogue is featured with Gemini. You get additional facts but may not know what to do about them. Take it slow, easy. You have not been appointed a saint.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Gifts, love, luxury all are in spotlight. Emotions tend to dominate. Strive to provide some time for logic, too. Avoid basing actions entirely on impulse. Taurus person deserves time, attention. You can learn and benefit—if diplomatic.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Real estate, property and basic values are apt to be featured. Pisces, Virgo individuals figure prominently. Get rundown on values, conditions—and emphasize plumbing. Practical matters should dominate—don't be afraid to ask "delicate" questions.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Money from one who seem indifferent could "make your day." Relatives, neighbors and short journeys are in limelight. Calls, correspondence also command attention. Tendency is to scatter forces—try to finish what you start.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Check Sagittarius message. Count your change. Be more aware of costs, collections, credits and debits. You find missing link. You discover how to put together a deal or make an operation operate. You will be given essential tools, credentials.

AQUARIUS (Jan. - Feb. 20): All signals point to starting, aking initiative, testing popularity. You are favored by many indications—now you must make the most of chances, offers. Leo plays significant role, as does another Aquarian. Get going. Use showmanship. Display product. Emphasize personality.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Much that is on agenda could be shrouded in mystery. Glamor is featured. Poetic actions, statements, symbols are part of scheme of today's happenings as they relate to you. Don't push, force. What you really want will become readily available.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you have domestic streak which surfaces and really cannot be denied. You draw to you persons born under Cancer and Capricorn. You are poetic, musical and have tendency to brood. September could be your most significant month of 1974. You often seem to be in conflict with your own best interests. But this year will be marked by advancement.

Swimmers lost two: both co-captains

By BOB HIGGINS
MDC Sports Staff

The UMass swim team will lose only two members next year, but they will be two of the most important men on this year's squad. They are co-captains George Kwiecien and Dick Blaisdell.

"If I go on in coaching, which I hope to do, I hope to have a co-captain like George," swim coach Bey Melamed said of Kwiecien. "He was a great help to myself and the team, not as a swimmer, because he wasn't our best, but as a leader." Anyone attending a meet could see this, as George would be there waving towels and cheering his teammates on. "I know from personal experience that it helps a swimmer," he stated, "It also creates team unity, and it's great to have someone pulling for you."

George, a municipal recreation major from Melrose, is now at home doing field work. "I never thought I'd be saying this, at the middle of the season, but I'm really sad to be leaving." He had some problem at the beginning of the season, being overloaded with work, applying to grad school, and being troubled with some minor ailments. As the season progressed, he began to work things out and by season's end had improved his time in the 100-yard backstroke by over 2 seconds, a remarkable accomplishment.

The other graduating senior is Dick Blaisdell. "Dick was the most consistent swimmer I had," said Coach Melamed. "I could always count on him to anchor a relay, and I could depend on his time."

Dick is a BDIC major in singing and dancing. This took up a great deal of his time during the season, and he often had to miss one or two practices a week.

Both men are very enthusiastic about the coaching of Bey Melamed. "He gave us a great deal of drive and team spirit, which is important to a team," said Blaisdell. "I was very impressed," said Kwiecien. "We were in better shape than any of us dreamed we could be. I think this was the secret of the team's success."

They are both enthusiastic about the future of the team as well. "If they pick up a few more swimmers, and I'm sure they will, the team has a good shot at a 9-4 or 10-3 season next year," remarked Kwiecien.

Maybe so, but it won't be easy to fill the holes left by the graduation of these two men.

Winners of Dufresne Trophy...

both Orr and Espo

BOSTON (AP) - For the first time in its 39-year-history, the Elizabeth C. Dufresne Trophy will be awarded to two members of the Boston Bruins National Hockey League club.

The award, named in honor of a friend of the fan who donated it during the 1935-36 season, is presented annually to the Bruins player judged most outstanding performer in home games by a vote of hockey writers and sportscasters.

This year, the award will be shared by Bobby Orr and Phil Esposito, the Bruins announced today.

This year's presentation will be made at Boston Garden April 7 before the season finale with Toronto.

Women hoopers end winning schedule

By LINDA MACKLER

The women's basketball team completed a better than .500 season with a 7-5 record and a seed in the Regional Tournament.

They were sparked this year by co-captains Jeannie Abrahamson and Marilyn Ritz and veterans Jenny Edminster, Ann Foley, and Pat Glispin.

When the team went to the Regional Tournament in Brooklyn, New York they won the first round game against the University of Rhode Island, 61-53. They made second round competition for the first time, but then fell to second seeded Queens College 75-46. They finished the tournament as the fifth seeded team.

Coach Jane Farr felt, "We had a better balanced squad than in the past. It was much more disciplined and very coachable."

The team's highpoint came at the beginning of the season, when they beat Northeastern.

"It put us on the right track,"Coach Farr said. "We knew we could beat a good team and a tall team."

But Coach Farr's expectations for greatness were shattered when the two leading scorers and rebounders were injured. They only played three times together the whole season.

"We shouldn't have lost to Keene State, Bridgewater, or the University of New Hampshire," Coach Farr said. "The University of New Hampshire was a particular disappointment because we didn't know we would be with Jenny until the first quarter."

So although UMass was a strong team this year, the Minutewomen look to be even better in 1975. Only senior Marilyn Ritz, at guard, is leaving the squad.

Sophomore Jenny Edminster will remain at forward, where she broke all previous records this year by setting a 12.4 scoring pace and grabbing an average of 10.3 rebounds a game.

Junior Pat Glispin will also be back as the 5'7" center, who added 10.8 points and 8.1 rebounds a game.

Rookie freshmen Chris Basile and Kate Stanne made outstanding varsity debuts this season. The team can expect not only repeat performances from these two players, but also the addition of several junior varsity hoopsters, particularly Jan Franks, a freshman center and Nancy O'Neil, a freshman forward.

Other returning members to the team will be Karen Fruzzetti, Chris Molonea, and Joanne Smith.

Cowhide baseballs make for headaches

CHICOPEE, Mass. (AP) - Tearing the cover off the ball used to the special province of the might Caseys of baseball.

But in a spring training game last week Juan Beniquez of the Red Sox did it on an infield grounder. Later in the same game Bud Harrelson of the Mets put a two-inch gash in a ball's cover when he fouled off a pitch.

Concerned baseball officials returned the balls to Spalding, the sporting goods campany here that has manufactured major league baseballs for generations.

Worried fans began to wonder if the elders of the game had pitched themselves into a baseball shortage by tampering with the venerable rule that insisted that the ball's cover be made of horsehide.

For the first time, the 300,000 balls that will be used by the 24 major league teams this year will be covered with cowhide, the result of a horsehide shortage.

After tests, Spaulding officials say they've concluded that the cowhid balls damaged last week were no cause for concern.

"It may have been a fluke," said one official, who said a few bad balls occasionally turn up.

"During the season, balls are thrown out for any reason-a smudge or a nick. During spring training the balls are kept in play much longer to use as few as possible and people tend to overlook that," he said.

"The cowhide ball has been tested in the lab and on the field. It was used in the winter leagues down in the islands. We've been developing it and experimenting with it for five years and it has exactly the same playing and performance characteristics as the horsehide ball," Lawton said.

Ruggers face stiff schedule

By MDC STAFF

The mild weather of early March brought the UMass ruggers out of hibernation from the depths of the Blue Wall, and the basement of Goessman. UMass rugby faces its most difficult season in several years with nine games. The ruggers open their season March 23 against the number two club in New England, Providence. On following weekends, they confront among others BC, Harvard Business, Holy Cross, and Brown, before closing with the annual bloodbath against Amherst.

The Minutemen ruggers, led by Piggy Tkacik and Paul Greenfield, had an encouraging fall season (7-4 record) and closed on an optimistic note, shutting out Boston College 3-0. The spring season will offer stiffer competition as more good athletes recognize the challenge of rugby. UMass lost several veterans to mid-winter graduation and to practice teaching and will be rebuilding a strong team. The portents are favorable, given New Zealander Brian Kain to lead the hard running backs and grad student Dan Georgianna to discipline a young pack of forwards.

The rugby club is open to all members of the university community and welcomes new members to its practices, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday each week at 4:30 p.m. on the rugby fields west of Boyden.

But football dominated the program

McGuirk made 'Mass an athletic power

By RICH SEVIERI

Second in a three part series

In 1968 Warren McGuirk had served nearly two decades as UMass' Athletic Director. He had built an athletic program that he felt "compared with any state university's in the country." The program failures of the 50's, were replaced by six Keany Trophies in the 60's, emblematic of their conference supremacy in all athletics.

McGuirk created an excellent intramural program, then concentrated his energy and the Department's money on construction of a first rate football program. He succeeded. However, the talk of going "big time" was not part of his vocabulary.

"We musn't use the word 'big time' on this campus," said McGuirk to a Collegian interviewer in '67. "If we had all the money in the world it would be hard for us to go big time. We have scholastic requirements that must be recognized."

Another requirement that had to be recognized was the Yankee Conference's "20 Formula." The 20 Formula was the name given the YanCon's president's code limiting full scholarships to 20 for the 5 major sports.

UMass and UConn struggled with the three northern conference schools to have the restrictions of the 20 Formula eased. In the summer of '68 the 20 Formula was altered. It now only applied to football and basketball, and each school was allowed to seek it's own level of competition. Talk of withdrawing from the conference ended.

There were a number of contributing factors that silenced the talk of going big time in football and other athletic programs. Some were: the bounds imposed by the YanCon; poor press coverage in Boston; inability to obtain Boston radio outlet for games; the apathy shown their product by Pioneer Valleyites.

Calls to equalize athletic expenditures echoed in the Athletic Department's halls as well as Collegian editorials in 1966. But the football program still received the lion's share of the 68-69 athletic budget. The $390,000 budget came from the $30 athletic fees of 13,000 students. Football's share was $78,000, along with an $80,000 stadium debt service payment to the Building Authority.

The remainder of the budget was amongst the 34 other varsity, JV, and freshmen teams.

The basketball program was a distant 2nd to football on the Athletic Department's priority list. Hockey was relegated to the "forgotten 34."

Matt Zunic promised "national recognition" when he became head basketball coach in 61-62. He fulfilled that promise in his first year with the University's first NCAA regional playoff bid, a 70-50 loss to NYU.

Zunic was fired the following year. The University claimed his violent rantings against officials were detrimental to the school's image.

In a Boston Globe article almost 6 years after his firing, Zunic is credited with making basketball a major sport at UMass. The Globe article stated that Zunic was not fired for his poor conduct on the court, but his reporting of rule violations in the football program.

John Orr replaced Zunic, and after 3 years of .500 basketball he resigned to sell insurance in Illinois. Selling insurance couldn't have agreed with him, for last week he led Michigan to an opening round upset of Notre Dame in the NCAA regionals.

It's debateable whether or not Matt Zunic made basketball a major sport here. But there is no doubt who the man was that brought consistency and its finest hours to the basketball program. That man was Jack Leaman.

Pennington to join WFL Detroit Wheels

By MIKE BROPHY

Peil Pennington, former quarterback of the University of Massachusetts Minutemen, is expected to sign with the Detroit Wheels of the World Football League, Ray Hozer, director of public relations, announced this morning in a telephone interview.

In his senior year at UMass, Pennington completed 44.5 per cent of his passes for a total of 1802 yards, setting a school record in that department.

He also was among the leading rushers on the Minutemen squad, gaining 390 yards on 105 attempts. However, he was caught behind the line for total losses of 278 yards while attempting to pass.

His net total of 112 yds. rushing placed him third on the UMass squad.

A good running quarterback, Pennington ran for seven touchdowns himself for 42 points in becoming the second leading scorer on the squad.

Pennington and his wife, Sally, will fly to Detroit for the signing Tuesday afternoon. The actual signing, Hozer siad, will take place sometime Wednesday morning.

The Wheels have also signed Bruce Shaw of North Carolina State as a possible quarterback prospect for their opening season.

Details of the contract were not released by the Wheels as of this time.

Head coach for the Wheels, Dan Boisture, said of Pennington "This marks another stride in putting an excellent team on the field for our first year like the size of Peil as at 6-5 he has the ability to read the defenses easier."

"Pennington quarterbacked a pro-style offense at UMass and should be able to step into our plans more quickly," he added, referring to the pro style game that Dick MacPherson runs at UMass.

Intramural finals tonight

By RUSS SMITH

Intramurals: The fans said it at Madison Square Gardens, Saturday night, after the Minutemen were upset (?!)..freshmen say it when they first see the vending machines in the Campus Center, which say Cigarette Papers (what's wrong with rolling your own...cigarettes?),.:and I said it when the game between the Moore House Bullets and the Knicks was over: "I don't believe it!"

The Knicks were supposedly ousted from the playoffs by Ossibissa last week 24-21. But they protested the game to the I.M. office on the basis of the score and the game was scheduled to be played again.

Well, it was, and this time the Knicks got the breaks. They also got the game, 40-37.

This really isn't fair to the Ossibissa: They had won the first game. I had the same score, but it seems the best way to handle this situation, would've been to make it a best-out-of-three series instead of one more game.

But back to the Bullets-Knicks game. The Bullets had this one almost all the way, but lost it. The B's held the lead midway through the game, 14-8. Turnovers, fouls and missed shots hurt the Knicks, and the Bullets seemed ready to advance to the next round.

The Knicks, however, weren't sympathetic to the Bullets and refused to die. In fact, they got back their confidence, their shooting and passing; they got everything back together again. The closer the K's got, the more nervous the B's played, and before you knew it, the Knicks had gone ahead by a 29-26 score. With time running out, the only hope left for the Moore House team was a three-point play. It didn't come and that was the game.

If you're tired of hearing about the Knicks, and are wondering what other teams are playing, here you go.

Last night, the semi-finals were played, with the Baker Broncos facing the Pacemakers, and Shaka playing last year's IM basketball champs, the Hot Shots.

The Pacemakers have been winning rather convincingly through the playoffs, with last nights game no exception. The Baker team undoubtedly was smaller, and put up a good fight, but all in vain, as they lost, 44-35. Only down by six at the half, they closed to within two, 22-20 early in the second half. But fouls sealed their doom, and now, it's wait until next year.

Meanwhile, Shaka earned the right to play the Pacemakers for the championship, via their 35-33 victory over the Hot Shots. The Hot Shots led 15-11 nearing the end of the first half, but Shaka didn't let that bother them. They kept digging, and at the half led, 19-17. It stayed close until, with two minutes remaining, the Shots missed three shots in a row, and Shaka went up by five, 33-28. This looked to be the game, but the Shots got hot again. But the clock ran out of them, and the season ended.

In the women's basketball: Field Gold will play the Fillies for the title. Field defeated the Koalas in round one, and the Dupas in the semis, while the Fillies have taken care of the Coolidge Lakers and Sigma Kappa.

The finals will be played in Boyden (301) tonight at 7 p.m.

NIT Quarter-finals: Jacksonville 85, Maryland-Eastern Shore 83

Earle Barroll

Patterns and talent

In the end Jacksonville had let me down. Not because it had defeated UMass, but because it had masqueraded as an Eastern basketball team. It was in fact not a vintage Jacksonville performance, and that's why they won a basketball game Saturday night.

The Dolphins hadn't turned the ball over 350 times as I expected; nor had they penetrated the midline, thrown up a shot and said it was of the high percentage variety; nor had they juked the house out with navel fakes and ridiculous diversions to their summer league antics.

Yes, this WAS Jacksonville, in the same breath with Oral Roberts, Austin Peay, Maryland-Eastern Shore and the former Southwest Louisianans. And they were into PATTERNS. Oh sure, there were a couple of instinctive projectiles early in the game, but after a quick time out, the name of the game was P-A-T-T-E-R-N-S.

"There is a place for both," said Jacksonville boach Bob Gottlieb after the game. He, of course, was referring to the more common disciplined game and the run and gun circus his team has been refuted to epitomize.

Jacksonville DID throw 'em up in the first couple of minutes and found themselves down 13-8, with six of their points from 6'10 Butch Taylor on layups, or layins if you wish. Incidentally Taylor does bear a marked facial resemblance to Artis Gilmore, but that's where the comparison ends.

But they also got a jumper from 38th street from Henry Williams, a couple from the mezzanine compliments of Leon Benbow and a 40 foot high percentage bomb from Jimmy Clark. That was enough for Gottlieb. "UMass stopped what we did best," he explained. We just had to go to patterns, or we couldn't have been in the game."

"Honestly," he continued, "I don't think during the season we could have beaten a team as well coached as UMass." Gottlieb came to Jacksonville this year after interning as an assistant coach at disciplined Kansas State. "And it has been a difficult adjustment for the players to make," he said. "They are responding much better to what I want. Some times they will run and gun when we have to, but for the most part they are now peaking towards this type of basketball."

While UMass was able to strategically take Jacksonville out of its usual game plan, which in effect was a blessing in disguise for the Dolphins, there was just nothing the Minutemen could do with them physically. You combine their talents within a pattern, and that was the story of the game.

"It's just like fighting a big guy," was the way Jack Leaman put it. "It has to wear you down. They did physically wear us down." Actually there was no end to their size. After Taylor's 6'10 frame there was 6'8 and 6'6 with 235 pounds accosting UMass. And if this wasn't enough the beef on the bench was 6'7, 6'8, etc.

"We couldn't get THE rebound," said Leaman. "Nothing against Al (Skinner), John (Murphy) and Peter (Trow). They had to jump three times just to contest for a rebound. In the end they were tired as heck. It's just awful tough to play catch up when the physical odds are that great."

Leaman also announced yesterday that recruit numero uno has signed his letter of intent for UMass. His name is Mike Pyatt and he's a good one from New York City. He's 6'5½ with springs, averaged 25 points and 12 rebounds a game and led his Bishop DuBois H.S. team to a berth in the Catholic High School City playoffs.

Pyatt was selected All-City first team by the N.Y. Post, All Arch-Diocesan and his biggest achievement to date was his being selected to the Junior Olympic Team last year. He's the quick forward UMass will be losing in Al Skinner and will have a shot at that position next fall.

He's white, ashamed but helping Mohawks anyway

By MIKE ALLAIN
MDC Staff

Seventy year-old Fr. Fred C. deFriesse of Amherst, who says that the U.S. Government's treatment of Indians sometimes "makes me ashamed that I am a white man," is seeking help.

Not for himself, but for the Mohawk Nation, a tribe of less than 3,000 Indians living on the St. Regis Indian Reservation located about 15 miles northeast of Massena, N.Y., near the Quebec border.

Dr. deFriesse is currently looking for contributions of lumber, building materials, and money from persons in the Amherst area, to help the Mohawks in their efforts to build housing.

Several Mohawks recently appealed directly to deFriesse, a personal friend of theirs for assistance in locating the needed lumber.

"I'd like people to bring whatever they can," said Dr. deFriesse, "such as a piece of plywood or a couple of two-by-fours."

"All contributors will be invited to meet the Indians when they come to Amherst in a couple of weeks to tell me what and how much they need."

Dr. deFriesse, a retired physicist, has been friendly with Indians since his childhood, when, he said, he "was brought up" by Indians in Wyoming.

After moving to the East, his interest and concern for Indians has remained strong.

"People must know Indians," he said. "They are very peaceful, very intelligent people, the most non-violent invididuals on god's earth.

"There are not even any dirty words or curse words in their language."

The Mohawk Nation refuses to sign a pledge of allegiance to the United States Government, Dr. deFriesse pointed out.

"They are traditionalists," he said. "They want to live like their predecessors, not like the white man. Pride forces them to do this."

They ignore the "assistance" of the government, said Dr. deFriesse, who cited the Indian's need to be a "free man, god's man--not a politician's."

Such governmental intervention into Indian affairs leads to what Dr. deFriesse termed "watering down" the Indian culture.

"The government takes Indian children," Dr. deFriesse said, "and puts them into schools in different states. They should be going to Indian sschools to learn about their own language and culture."

Dr. deFriesse pointed out the "numerous treaties with the Indians were not honored by the government," and "Indian tribes have been massacred by the white man," in explaining the Mohawks refusal to pledge allegiance.

Anyone with any building materials or money to contribute to the Mohawk Nation is requested to phone Dr. deFriesse at 256-8358 to make arrangements with him for delivery of the materials or money to his Bay Road, South Amherst ranch.

"I want contributions from people with consciences," he said.

Senate moves to impeach Apostola

By MIKE HENAULT
MDC Staff

(Staff Photo-Chris Bourne)

Nick Apostala (center)

A formal motion to impeach Senate President Nick Apostola was introduced at last nights session of the Senate.

The move was presented by Tim O'Brien, Head of Central Area Government. O'Brien's proposal has the backing of all residential governments as well as from the majority of the Senate leadership.

The motion came two hours after a joint committee of area government heads asked for Aposola's resignation. Apostola refused. "I will not resign" he added. "You can take any one of Nixon's quotes and use them."

Larry St. Cyr, Head of Southwest Residential Area listed the basic reasons for the introduction of the impeachment resolution. They are:

(1) Failure to fulfill campaign promises to decentralize student government.

(2) Failure to produce a constitution as promised in last year's election.

(3) Voting, in a meeting of the Board of Trustees, for the present parking system against the expressed wishes of the Senate.

(4) Blatant failure in exercising his office by attending no area government meetings since he was elected.

Originally, there was a hesitancy among the managers of the motion because of the short period before the next Presidential elections (April 22).

But some of the supporters of the measure said it was the "principal of the thing." They then formally introduced the measure which will, if successful, be the first time in SGA history that a President was impeached. The bill of Impeachment will arise for official consideration at the April 3 Senate meeting. At that time a simple majority can impeach Apostola. If that occured, Apostola would have to be tried by a court and, if convicted he would be removed. The court would be made up seven-nine judges of the Student Judiciary plus three members of the Seante appointed by the Speaker with the approval of two-thirds of that body.

Vacancy of the office is inevitable because of the upcoming Presidential Convention on April 22. As yet only one candidate has taken out nomination papers which are available in the Student Senate Office.

$1,500 voted vets for D.C. trip

The UMass commuter assembly yesterday voted $1,500 to a growing of post-World War II servicemen planning to protest allegedly inadequate veterans benefits next week in Washington.

Meanwhile, members of the UMass vets club estimated yesterday that at least 250 veterans and UMass students have signed a statement of intent to travel by bus to Washington, D.C. March 29 to protest the inadequate benefits.

The vets have been selling applies at a table on the Campus Center concourse since Monday in an effort to raise funds for the buses. Once in Washington, they plan to sell apples on street corners to mock what World War II veterans did to get better benefits in the forties.

The vets have collected $200 through apple sales so far and have received donations from the American Legion and private sources, according to Don Toohey, Vets club treasurer.

The commuter assembly voted money to the Washington-destined vets with the understanding that they will return whatever they can at a later date. The assembly also stipulated that their donation would be noted as a news story in The Collegian.

Al Muir, a Governing Committeeman, said that the purpose of the trip was to "lobby for equal rights for Vietnam veterans. Our benefits are less than those of World War II vets, not so much in terms of money as buying power."

The present veterans benefits were described by Frank Cotter, Director of Veteran's Affairs at UMass.

"If a veteran is single, he gets $220 per month; if married, $261, with one child $298, and $18 per child after that. Federal benefits don't allow for tuition at all. Some states do, which causes a gross inequity in benefits. Massachusetts and about six other states offer tuition waivers - but only at state schools."

"For the World War II vets," he continued," all or most of the tuition was taken care of at public and private schools. The government carried the load then; now the states have to."

The House of Representatives has approved a 13.6 percent increase in GI benefits and the Senate is considering a 25 percent increase. President Nixon plans to veto anything over 8 percent.

Toohey, said that the Vets will be satisfied with anything over 13 percent, but that the 8 percent increase would not even cover the cost of living increase.

Toohey outlined plans for the trip to Washington. "We're going down by bus on the 28th and hopefully will be getting to know a lot of other vets from Massachusetts that night. We don't yet know where we'll be staying then but we're working on it. Then on the 29th, we'll be selling apples on the corners and speaking to as many Congressmen as we possibly can. We hope to speak to all the congressmen from Massachusetts as well as those directly involved with veterans."

Police nab two after auto chase

Two Boston men were arrested by UMass police following a high-speed chase around the campus.

Paul C. Ramos, 23, of Boston, the driver, was charged with possession of marijuana with intent to sell, driving to endanger, driving without a license, and going through a stop sign.

Leodus Thompson, 21, of Boston, a passenger was charged with possession of marijuana with intent to sell.

Saul Chafin, Assistant Director in charge of Operations for the UMass Department of Public Safety, said "The reason that we're going to push the 'intent to sell' part of it is that they had more than a pound of marijuana between them. No one carries that much for their own use."

Police were tipped off to the presence of the two men, both non-students, on campus by a student. The two were discovered at the Campus Center by the police, who chased them from there to the corner of Mass Ave. and North Pleasant St., where the arrest was made.

Subsequent investigation revealed that there is a warrant out for Ramos' arrest in Cambridge. Police are continuing their investigation of the case.

La Dafne: an opera with vitality

By DOROTHY L. MULLER
MDC Staff

If the New York Pro Musica Antiqua is highly distinguished for verosimilitude in its repertoire performances of early opera masterpieces, the ensemble is also pleasantly distinguished for its youth. The vitality of those young men and women lends particular grace to the light mythological theme of tonight's performance of the early Baroque Opera, La Dafne composed by Marco de Gagliano.

Under the musical direction of George Houle, specialist in Medieval, Renaissance and Baroque music at Stanford University, Pro Musica is outstandingly oriented to the musical recreation of the age. In tonight's performance Mr. Houle will supplement the opera orchestration with renaissance wind instruments to achieve fidelity of sound.

La Dafne by Gagliano is uniquely situated at the very beginning of the history of modern opera. First performed in Mantua in 1608, the opera is a carefully articulated expression of Florentine Renaissance thought. Gagliano is a member of the Florentine Camerati, a group of thinkers and musical advocates, attempted to recreate the musical function in ancient Greek works. But with the lack of written evidence, the Camerata, evolved an arbitrary monodic style in which we find the genesis of early opera.

The monodic style was a concious revolt against the polyphony of earlier carnival works. And as a single vocal line sung in an easy declamatory style, gave more emotional expression to the poet's words than the earlier contrapuntal madrigal style.

The librette of La Dafne came from an earlier dramatic poem by Ottavie Renuccini. The plot is based upon a myth found in Ovid's Metamorphosis in which Apollo after slaying the Python is wounded by one of the love arrows and is enamored of a mortal girl, Dafne. Just as Apollo is about the seize her Dafne pleads with Zeus to rescue her and is transformed into an oak tree.

Structurally the opera is saved from the monotony of the sole style by the alternation of monody with aria-like passages. Overall, La Dafne although the product of dry musical theorizing, is pre-eminently enjoyable.

The company of "La Dafne" takes a well-earned bow.

Vets work for benefits

The Veterans Club has contacted other schools in Massachusetts and gotten some commitments as to other people going to Washington. UMass-Boston, Essex Coleege, and UConn have pledged representatives.

Muir, Toohey, and other representatives agreed that "Project Apple" was only a beginning. They cited "Employment, hospitalization, and counseling" as three areas that needed investigation and revamping.

"We believe that increasing the job opportunities for veterans would decrease the crime rate associated with them. We would like to see more hassle-free hospitalization for veterans, and addicts in particular. We would like to see more counseling both for returning veterans and for their families."

So far only veterans have signed up to go to Washington but the trip is open to anyone. Anyone wishing further information should drop into the Vets Club office in Room 309 of the Student Union or visit the table in the Campus Center.

Abortion an issue of choice

By ROBERTA MARTONE
MDC Staff

The abortion issue is an issue of choice, according to Beate Riesterer, a professor in the Sociology department at UMass.

"The abortion issue is not a question of taking or preserving a life, but an issue of having a choice available.", said Ms. Riesterer.

The ammendment legalizing abortion is currently being questioned by The Supreme Court. The Senate has already passed one anti-abortion ammendment, known as the Helms amendment. This ammendment bans the use of foreign aid funds for birth control programs, including dissemination of abortion information.

The Senate has also passed an anti-abortion rider prohibiting the use of Medicaid funds for abortion.

Several ammendments to be voted on by the Senate are: The Hogan ammendment, banning all abortions and possibly IUD's and morning after medication; the Buckley ammendment, banning all abortion from the time of implantation; and, the Whitehurst ammendment which would leave the decision of legalized abortion to the state legislatures.

Ms. Riesterer stressed that, if these ammendments were passed, they would reverse the Supreme Court decision. The Supreme Court decision states that a woman can have an abortion within a certain period of time after conception. This does not mean that an abortion must be given to her, or that a physician can't deny her his services, said Ms. Riesterer.

"The question of the right to life is undebatable, since there is no agreement on when life begins.", Ms. Riesterer said.

According to Ms. Riesterer, there are approximately 30 million abortions in the world per year. Before the Supreme Court decision, 2 million American women aborted annually.

"Abortion is not deviance on the side of the criminal minority, but an accepted and widespread method of birth control when other methods fall.", she said.

She continued to say that women will not stop aborting even when the law prohibits them to do so . Ms. Riesterer said she feels abortion once again will go "underground", and the mortality rate due to abortion will rise once more. It will be a "return to the Middle Ages".

The abortion issue pertains to men, as well as women, said Ms. Riesterer. Men have choices that women don't have, (eg vasectomy). She added that, although a man can have a vasectomy with minor "red tape", a woman must be over thirty-five years old, have the permission of her husband, and have conceived at least three children, to have an abortion.

Organization is the problem of pro-abortionists, according to Ms. Riesterer. The American Medical Association which supports abortion on medical grounds, is not actively engaged in maintaining the Supreme Court decision. In contrast, physicians belonging to the "Right To Lifers" are actively engaged in anti-abortion activities.

Ms. Riesterer also mentioned that she would like to see the legal profession "take a firm stand" in the abortion issue.

She stressed the idea that people supporting the present Supreme Court decision should write to their state senators.

"Any form of effective birth control allows choice. Absence of birth control means anti-choice. The point for women is the right to chose.", concluded Ms. Riesterer.

Poor, workers disenfranchised, socialist candidate says

By DENNY MATTEAU
MDC Staff

Don Gurewitz, Socialist Workers Party candidate for governor, spoke in 164 Campus Center to a crowd of about fifty students Tuesday night.

Gurewitz' speech dealt mainly with the two-party system and its consequences. "The situation you have in this coutnry is one where the rich are represented by the two parties and the bulk of the poor and workers are not."

He went on to point out the money necessary to get on ballots, saying, "Wallace himself said he had to spend a hundred thousand dollars to get his party on the Massachusetts ballot."

Gurewitz said that different political parties should truthfully reflect different segments of society. "In England, for example, workers and students belong to the labor party. There is no illusion there that their interests are the same as the capitalist. Here, a factory worker might say "I am a capitalist" but he is not. If he doesn't even own his own home, where's his capital? He might identify with his company when he says 'we're in a period of expansion' but does he say 'We laid me off this week'?"

Attacking Sargent, Gurewitz said, "His answer to the energy crisis was to drop pollution standards so they wouldn't cut capitalists' profit margins. Well the socialists' approach is keep those pollution standards up, we want to breathe! Forget the profit. If the capitalist then wants to shut the plant down, let him. The workers can run it themselves."

When asked about specific actions a socialist governor could take, Gurewitz said his first would be to go to court to force compliance with the racial unbalance laws. "We'd do that the first day" he said.

But he added that he holds no illusions of a socialist victory at the polls. "We don't say 'Vote for me and I'll set you free'" he said. "As a third party, our main hope is to force corruption into the open, and we say if you support us vote for us, and join the picket lines! We can't do it for you."

He ended by quoting Eugene Debbs, a pre-WWII socialist who said "It's better to vote for what you want and not get it than to vote for what you don't want and get it."

Debby Bustin, the recent Socialist Workers Party candidate for mayor in Atlanta, also spoke against the two-party system. She illustrated her point with an anecdote about Linda Jenness, the 1972 SWP presidential candidate. "Several weeks ago, she said "Linda was having an argument with her landlord, a typical New York activity, and he said to her 'I know about you! I heard from the FBI about the illegal things you've done!' 'What illegal things?' she said. 'You ran for President!' was his answer."

Bustin is now involved in the SWP suit against Nixon and other government officials, charging that the FBI and agents working for the administration have systematically harrassed and disrupted SWP activities, thereby denying them their rights of following the political party of their choice. According to the SWP newspaper, The Militant, of March 22 the Justice Department released FBI documents including one headlined "SWP Disruption Program" which states "Offices receiving copies of this letter are participating in the Bureau's Communist Party-USA Counterintelligence program. It is felt that a disruption program along similar lines (to one elaborated elsewhere) could be initiated against the SWP on a selective basis." Bustin herself was called before a Senate Hearing after the massive April 24, 1970 ahtiwar march in Washington. "Eighteen spies who had been active in my office testified to the committee that I had worked day and night for the four months to support the demonstration, and that I was a bonafide member of the Socialist Workers. All that was obvious and perfectly legal and if they had simply asked me, I would have told them so." she said. She said that a 16-year old girl, Janet Patton, had written to SWP national headquarters asking for information to be used in a high school project, and as a result of her letter was subjected to a criminal investigation by the FBI.

Self-awareness key to Arica Institute

By DONNA HARTMAN
MDC Staff

The Arica Institute "dawned" on Amherst on Friday, March 15 with a free grand opening celebration for its new facility at 1 Cook Place. Over sixty people, mostly local students and faculty enjoyed an evening filled with live music, dancing, Arica work, joy, love and refreshments. The consecutive Saturday classes were filled with interested participants.

Eliot Cowan, Peggy Arent and Al Shackman, teachers at the new facility, explained the importance and purpose of Arica for all human beings of today. "The Institute, a not-for-profit corporation with centers in nineteen cities here and abroad, is an ecletic, pragmatic, empirical and comprehensive system for the development of self-awareness."

The program, designed particularly for modern westerners, is a fast, experimental process which eliminates the requirement of belief or faith. The forty day training and advanced programs prepare one to become a member of the school and ultimately a teacher. The teacher's primary role is that of a "technician" passing on the work to students who acquire the techniques through doing the work and also become teachers.

Arica's training process is mainly a group activity which requires group energy: "the more people, the more energy." During the experiential learning process, a trainee works to regain the "essential energy" that one has lost to the negativity of his daily personality games. By following the "rigorously structured" training process and techniques of building on essential energy, one can destroy the "mechanical" structure and responses of the ego and personality and return to his essential nature.

Arica's goal is to instill "unity in a person, within himself and therefore within society," through intellectual, emotional and physical harmony. According to Arica, in today's world the techniques of returning to essential nature should be learned and performed by all men in order to insure the survival of the planet.

The Arica Institute, a synthesis of ancient east and modern western techniques of producing conciousness, was established in Chile in 1969 by Oscar Ichazo. His studies of the disciplines of the east led to the formation of Arica. He then taught many Americans his techniques of developing self awareness. They, in turn, passed the news on to the United States and Arica has been growing ever since.

Arica in Amherst has scheduled weekly Open Faith Classes as follows: Breathing, Meditation and Mantra on Monday at 7:00 p.m., Arica Karma Cleaning also on Monday at 8:30 p.m., Social Yoga on Friday at 8:30 p.m., Arica Dance and Movement on Friday at 7:00 p.m., and a free Introduction to Arica, every Wednesday except march 20, from 8-10 p.m. Open Path Trainings offered include the Open Path Weekend, Five Day Training, Forty Day Intensive Training and Forty Day Extended Training. Anyone interested in The Arica Institute should call 256-0634 in Amherst, 634-5504 in Cummington, or drop in at 1 Cook Place in Amherst.

UMass police learn how at training group Monday

By FRITZ GEURTSEN
MDC Staff

A ten-week training program for police officers will begin Monday at the UMass police station.

The purpose of the program, according to Al Lawson, Assistant Director in charge of Administration for the Department of Public Safety, is "to deal with the big vacuum that now exists in regard to University police personnel getting the training that they need."

The course, which will meet forty hours a week, will also be attended by officers from Smith, Amherst College and Springfield College. The $200 tuition charge will be paid by the institutions sending the individual officers.

The course will be taught jointly be people from the Department, state police instructors, instructors from State and Federal agencies, and University representatives.

"The Program," said Lawson, "will be primarily geared toward campus police work. We're trying to deal with matters that directly concern officers who have to relate to a college or university surrounding on a day to day basis."

Officers enrolled in the program have the option of receiving college credit, in addition to the certificate they will receive upon graduation from the program.

"Through the Office of Continuing Education," Lawson said, "we have worked out a program with Springfield Technical Community College for such credit.

"Currently UMass has no law enforcement program, but I think one is extremely necessary. Western Mass really has no adequate four-year program in law enforcement. This is especially true in the area of police administration and research."

Although the course is presently open only to police officers, Lawson predicted that it would be available to anyone in the future, especially students interested in law enforcement.

"We're hoping to offer this course twice a year," he concluded, "and maybe also in the summer. There's been a tremendous response to the literature that we've sent out describing the course."

Chet Huntley dies of cancer

BOZEMAN, Mont. (AP) — Chet Huntley, whose resonant voice and rough-hewn face became familiar to millions on the nightly television news, died yesterday in his mountain resort home. He was 62.

He underwent surgery for lung cancer in January but had remained active until recent weeks. He died at 2:20 a.m., according to his widow, Tippy Huntley.

Huntley was teamed for 14 years with David Brinkley on NBC's Huntley-Brinkley Report. He quit in 1970 and returned to his native Montana to develop the $20-million Big Sky resort complex.

The Huntley-Brinkley team was formed at the 1956 political conventions, and their nightly news program went on to become part of American folklore. Huntley's seriousness was balanced by Brinkley's sharp wit.

The program won every major television news award, including seven Emmies and two George Foster peabody awards.

NBC anchorman John Chancellor described Huntley as "one of the most important people in the history of journalism in this country."

CBS correspondent Walter Cronkite said, "Chet Huntley was a fine journalist, a respected competitor and a good friend. We have missed him since he retired. We will miss him even more keenly as a man."

Huntley got his start in the news business with a $10-a-month job with a 100-watt radio station, KCBC, in Seattle. For news, he bought a Seattle Star and rewrote it for a 15-minute newscast every night.

He worked for all three major television networks. He joined CBS at Los Angeles in 1939 as correspondent for 11 Western states, moved to ABC in 1950 and four years later joined NBC in New York.

Huntley's efforts to develop the Big Sky resort, with the Chrysler Realty Corp. as the principal stockholder, were often embroiled in controversy. Conservationists opposed the project.

After he returned to Montana it was widely rumored Huntley would seek a U.S. Senate seat. But Huntley said he found that Mike Mansfield was going to run again and "you'd have to be a fool to run against Mansfield in Montana."

Huntley was born the son of a railroad telegrapher in Cardwell, Mont., and spent his early years on a small farm on the prairies of the northwestern part of the state.

Soviet military helicopter accidently lands in China

MOSCOW (AP) - A Soviet military helicopter with a three-man crew strayed over the Chinese border six days ago, the Soveit news agency Tass reported yesterday. The incident threatened to worsen the chronic frontier quarrel between the two Communist giants.

Moscow requested the immediate return of the crew, but Peking remained silent, the official news agency Tass said.

The helicopter "lost its bearings" and made an emergency landing in bad weather on Chinese territory last Thursday after running out of fuel, Tass reported.

The chopper was on a rescue operation to pick up a gravely ill soldier in the Altai region bordering China's Sinkiang Province, the agency claimed. The region is just west of Mongolia, 2,200 miles southeast of Moscow and 1,600 miles west of Peking.

It appeared that the helicopter crew was attached to the Soviet border guards, the military wing of the security police,known as the KGB. The ill serviceman was believed to be one of the estimated one million Soviet combat troops stationed along the Sino-Soviet borders.

Chinese informants in the Soviet capital confirmed the request was made to Ambassador Liu Hsin-chuan on March 15. The Chinese envoy denied any knowledge of the matter, but said he would ask Peking.

The incident was a further reminder of the border problem between the two Communist giants which produced bloody frontier clashes on the Amur River in 1969. Talks to settle the frontier dispute were interupted last summer.

Western diplomats declined to speculate on the possible effects of the helicopter incident, apparently waiting for Peking's version of what happened.

Nixon decorates Skylab 3 crew

SPACE CENTER, Houston (AP) — President Nixon decorated America's record-setting Skylab 3 crew yesterday, inspected preparations for a joint U.S.-Soviet space mission and said "a great people must always explore the unknown."

After volunteering in jest for a 1980 space flight, Nixon told a crowd of about 5,000 on the lawn outside the Space Center:

"Always look to the unknown. Go there, take any risk, make any sacrifice and don't be discouraged because sometimes you may fail."

Nixon then headed back to Washington, clearly buoyed by his two-day Texas trip. The visit to the Space Center and a nationally televised question-and-answer session with broadcasters Tuesday night were part of his campaign to rebuild confidence in his Watergate-shaken administration.

"It always gives you a lift to come to Texas," Nixon told newsmen after his Space Center speech. "There's a lot of drive, a lot of spirit, a can-do attitude and that's what the country needs."

Gas supplies to stay tight

WASHINGTON (AP) - Despite the lifting of the Arab oil embargo, the United States can expect tight gasoline supplies for the rest of this year.

Gasoline shortages, estimated by President Nixon at 5 to 8 per cent, probably will not be large enough for a return to those long waiting lines that plagued many areas in February, but hhey could prove annoying unless motorists restrain their demand.

Furthermore, while existing gasoline inventories can be tapped to reduce the remaining shortages, those inventories do not appear large enough to close the gap completely.

Anderson convicted of tax evasion

BALTIMORE, (AP) — Dale Anderson, the Democrat who succeeded Spiro T. Agnew as the Baltimore County executive, was convicted by a federal jury yesterday of 32 counts on income tax evasion and extorting kickbacks from consultants.

The jury of six men and six women returned the guilty verdict on all counts after slightly more than eight hours of deliberation. They received the case Tuesday night following 10 weeks of testimony and legal arguments.

The 57-year-old Anderson was convicted of extorting $38,620 in cash kickbacks from architects and engineers in return for unbid consulting contracts from the suburban county.

Anderson succeeded Republican Agnew as the county's top executive in 1966. The same corruption probe led to Agnew's resignation as vice president and his conviction on federal income tax charges to which he pleaded no contest.

Anderson also was convicted of evading $59,947 in income taxes from 1969 through 1972, years when the government contended he understated his earnings by $126,877.

Emergency lottery for this year drawn

WASHINGTON (AP) — If an emergency requires resumption of the military draft next year, the first to be inducted will be men born Feb. 28, 1955. They drew No. 1 in the standby draft lottery yesterday.

But John D. Dewhurst, deputy director of Selective Service, began the two-hour-long ritual of mating numbers and birthdates by saying "there is no intention" by President Nixon or congressional leaders to restore induction authority.

The purpose of the annual lottery for young men becoming 19 is "insurance — plain and simple," Dewhurst said.

"The great experiment of maintaining a military force in peacetime of 2.2 million by volunteer means alone shows signs of achieving success," he said.

Dewhurst presided over the lottery in place of draft director Byron V. Pepitone, who had heart surgery last Friday.

The plucking of capsules out of two separate plastic drums — black ones showing birth dates and white ones for the 365 draft callup numbers — was performed by four local high school students.

No. 1 was picked when there were only 84 capsules left in each drum.

Before that, all the other low numbers had been assigned: No. 2, Jan. 5; No. 3, Feb. 16; No. 4 Sept. 24; No. 5, June 27; No. 6, March 13; No. 7, march 6; No. 8, March 24; No. 9, Oct. 22; No. 10, Oct. 13.

The highest number, 365, was given to April 29. The Christmas birthday drew No. 163 and New Year's No. 70.

Authority to draft men expired last June 30, but remaining sections of the draft law remain in effect. Nobody has been drafted in 18 months, however.

Those involved in this year's lottery registered last year at their 18th birthday and were placed in a holding "H" classification.

Those who received numbers 1 through 95 will be reclassified, according to their current civilian status, to provide a standby pool of "readily inductible" men during 1975. None, however, will be given physical and mental exams or otherwise processed.

Watergate defendants seek to halt Nixon report release

WASHINGTON (AP) — Attorneys for two of the Watergate cover-up defendants asked the U.S. Court of Appeals Wednesday to prevent federal Judge John H. Sirica from sending the Watergate grand jury's Nixon report to the House impeachment committee.

The appeals court scheduled a hearing for 10:30 a.m. today on whether to grant a delay in the delivery of the materials or stopping the transmittal altogether.

If the requested stay is not granted, the material must be delivered to the House Judiciary Committee by 4 p.m. Thursday.

The petitions were filed by lawyers for H.R. Haldeman and Gordon Strachan.

Haldeman's lawyers, John J. Wilson and Frank H. Strickler, asked Sirica to suspend his order "that delivery to the committee is eminently proper, and indeed, obligatory." The judge refused but granted a 24-hour delay to Thursday afternoon.

Meanwhile, there were these other Watergate developments:

—A study done for the Senate Watergate committee recommended that Congress bar the attorney general from advising the President on the President's legal problems. The report was by the National Academy of Public Administration.

—Atty. Gen. William G. Saxbe said at a news conference he has no objection to Justice Department lawyers volunteering for President Nixon's Watergate defense team and then returning later to the department.

—C.G. "Bebe" Rebozo, Nixon's friend, testified behind closed doors before the Senate Watergate committee.

—House Judiciary Committee lawyers, defending their attempts to get White House documents, said their requests are specific, related to Watergate and fully understood by Nixon's attorneys.

The day's developments in court began with Wilson petitioning the Appeals Court to prohibit Sirica from transmitting the Nixon report, or for an order to bottle it up.

Dean calls show high-level interest in Vesco case

NEW YORK (AP) — Deposed White House counsel John W. Dean III made at least four telephone calls reflecting high-level interest in the securities fraud case against financier Robert L. Vesco, a government witness said yesterday in federal court.

William Casey, onetime head of the Securities and Exchange Commission, testified at the criminal conspiracy trial of former Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell and ex-Commerce Secretary Maurice H. Stans that one of the calls was prompted by Mitchell.

Mitchell and Stans are accused of impeding an SEC investigation into Vesco's multibillion-dollar financial empire in return for the latter's secret $200,000 cash contribution to President Nixon's 1972 re-election campaign.

Dean is a coconspirator, although not a defendant, in the case and is scheduled to testify for the government later in the trial, which is now in its fifth week. He was ousted from his White House post in the aftermath of the June 18, 1972 break-in of the Democratic national headquarters at Watergate.

Part of a conspiracy the government alleges against Mitchell and Stans involves a charge that Mitchell caused Dean to seek postponement of SEC examinations of Vesco employes.

In line with this accusation, Casey testified that on the Thursday before the 1972 presidential elections he received a telephone call from Dean.

Princess Anne fired upon

LONDON (AP) — A man fired into a car carrying Princess Anne and her husband, Capt. Mark Phillips, as they were driving in the mall near Buckingham Palace last night, but the couple was not hit, a police spokesman said.

A Scotland Yard detective guarding the 23-year-old princess, their chauffeur and a policeman in the area were wounded, the spokesman reported. The extent of their wounds could not be immediately determined, but a spokesman at St. George's Hospital said the policeman and the driver "have got gunshot wounds in the body."

N.H. town eyed for refinery

ROCHESTER, N.H. (AP) - The Mayor of Rochester revealed yesterday that Gibbs Oil Co. of Revere, and the Shaheen Natural Resources Co. of New York are considering the city as a possible site for an oil refinery or "some other related industry."

Mayor John Shaw made the announcement at a press conference called to publicize his request to the city council for a referendum vote on the refinery issue.

However, a lawyer for Gibbs in Portland, Maine, said, "Gibbs knows absolutely nothing about it."

Harold Pachies, who has represented the company in its negotiations for a refinery in Sanford, Maine, about 15 miles from Rochester, said that as far as he knew Gibbs only has plans for the Sanford site. "That's the only place they want to build a refinery," he said.

Pachies said Gibbs expressed some preliminary interest in Rochester a year ago, but dropped consideration of city after moving ahead with the Sanford plan.

Shaw said that two other companies also were considering Rochester but he would not name them. He did say that Olympic Refineries, Inc., of New York was not one of them.

Olympic, with strong backing from Gov. Meldrim Thompson, proposed building a $600 million refinery in Durham. That proposal was defeated in a referendum at the town meeting and Rochester was mentioned as an alternative site.

Shaw has been critical of the governor's unbridled support for the Durham plan and said he didn't think Olympic would come to Rochester.

"They don't care for Rochester and I guess the feeling is mutual," he said.

The mayor has said on previous occasions that the town probably could support a 100,000 barrel-a-day refinery. He mentioned the so-called lagoon site, a huge tract of land which the city cleared for a pollution abatement project that never got off the ground.

Shaw said he wanted the referendum so that citizens could express their feelings about a refinery. The city of 15,000 is about 20 miles from the Maine and New Hampshire coasts.

The energy crisis

Users protest electric rates by refusing to pay bills

Soaring electric rates have prompted consumer complaints in several areas of the country, and some people are refusing to pay all or part of their bills.

An Associated Press survey showed the increases have hit every area of the country. The utilities say most of the rate hikes are due to rising fuel costs, both for coal and imported crude oil. Imported crude alone has jumped four-fold in the past year.

In Jacksonville, Fla., for example, the basic rates charged by the city-owned utility have stayed the same for 30 years. But fuel adjustment charges have risen astronomically.

The utility said the average homeowner's monthly bill this year is $27.70, compared to $17.90 last year, an increase of more than 50 per cent. A spokesman said the increase would have been higher, but customers reduced electricity usage because of the engery shortage.

Louis Winnard, manager director of the utility, said the increase is due solely to the rising cost of imported fuel. "There is definitely a tremendous consumer reaction," he said.

"We get a lot of petitions opposed to high electric bills with 4,000 to 5,000 signatures. We've sent them to Washington to show why we need a domestic fuel allocation."

Some customers are taking stronger action. "The increase in delinquent accounts is not astronomical, but it is up to about 5 per cent of our customers." Winnard said.

Stations say not on Sunday

BOSTON (AP) - Service station operators throughout Massachusetts have indicated they do not intend to begin pumping on Sundays in spite of President Nixon's lifting of the ban on Sunday gasoline sales.

"I do not think we have enough gas to open on Sunday. I don't believe you will see a great many go back to Sunday openings, unless they are in resort area," said Harold Murphy, president of the Bay State Gasoline Retailers Association.

Murphy said most dealers have discovered that they like a day off for relaxation, too, and will not resume Sunday hours.

In the Greater Boston area, most dealers said they still don't have adequate supplies to pump gasoline seven days a week.

"We're getting only 28,000 gallons for March, and we could use 85,000," said spokesman for Bob's Texaco Station in Dedham.

"We don't have enough gas to pump all day during the week, never mind on Sunday," was the word from a Mobil station in Lexington. "We'll stay closed."

"I'd open on Sunday if I could get an increased allotment. It would be easier for me to open because I have road service for the area," said a Wakefield dealer.

"I'll stay closed. I like the hours and no Sunday work," a Burlington station owner said.

Murphy said dealers on major highways will probably open on Sundays because they depend on transient trade.

For most dealers, however, he said Sunday openings "have been a losing proposition.

"It has been my feeling right along that they don't want to go back. As a general rule I think they will stay closed on Sunday."

Solar heat

BOSTON (AP) - A solar heating system is being used to supplement the regular heating system at Grover Cleveland Junior High School in the Dorchester section.

The solar heat, provided through 4,500 square feet of collector panels installed on the roof of the building, contributes up to 20 per cent of the heat required in the three-story school.

Around New England

Seeks fishing limit

BRUNSWICK, Maine (AP)- The New England congressional delegation should unite behind an effort to extend the fishing zone to the 200 mile limit, Democratic gubernatorial hopeful George J. Mitchell said yesterday.

"Unless prompt action is taken, Maine's $170 million a year fishing industry could be wiped out in few years," Mitchell told a senior citizens gathering 1in Brunswick.

Mitchell, a Democratic National Committeeman, said foreign fleets operating in the Gulf of Maine are adversely effecting the catches of New England fishermen. The fishing industry in Maine is already declining with the current 12 mile limit, he added.

"The only way we can get action in Congress is for the entire delegation from New England to work together as a bloc, unified for this common goal," Mitchell said.

Brown aps up

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) - Brown University has received more applications for admissions to its next freshman class than any other ivy league school, according to a school official.

James Rogers, director of admissions, said he feels the increase applications for Brown is a result of students wanting to go to school in a community atmosphere, and not be lost in the shuffle of a larger university.

New curriculum at Brown, permiting students greater leeway in chosing courses and more possibility of working closely with their professors, possibly is another factor, Rogers said.

Admissions applications currently total 9,400 for 1,150 places, he said. It is the largest number of applications received by this time of year in Brown's history, he said.

Contemum on Nixon

WASHINGTON (AP)- Rep. Silvie O. Conte, R-Mass, said yesterday he will continue to await the House Judiciary Committee's report before deciding how he will vote on impeachment, but said he opposes the idea that President Nixon should resign.

"I support the full subpoena power of the judiciary committee," Conte said in an interview.

"When the committee completes its report I will study it and then vote on the issue."

Conte said he opposes resignation because it would leave "a cloud hanging over the situation forever-was he guilty or was he innocent?"

Court ends B & M sickout

BOSTON (AP) - The 83 members of the United Transportation Union, Local 587, returned to work under a federal court injunction yesterday after a two-day sickout, but several other labor disputes throughout Massachusetts continued.

The Boston & Maine Railroad obtained the injunction in U.S. District Court here to force employes to return to their jobs at the East Deerfield freight terminal.

Union spokesmen said the injunction would be appealed.

In Quincy, 24 striking members of the Shipbuilding Workers Union, Local 5, and two non-union employes were arrested at the General Dynamics shipyard on disorderly conduct charges.

Police said Arthur Batson, 39, of Brockton, president of tte union was among those arrested.

The 1,700 member union struck the Quincy shipyard at midnight Saturday night and federal mediator Richard X. Goggin said no new meetings have been scheduled.

Watergate mentality: can you dare a spine?

By NAT CLARK

In 1971, Sargent Schriver, while speaking at Phillips Exeter Academy, talked about Viet Nam and its awful mistakes. He drew in that speech, some very fitting parallels between the men that "made" Vietnam and the students. One need only think for a moment about how appropriate his comments are to Watergate and its extravaganzas.

"Evasion, equivocation, creating a false impression, permiting mistruth to be believed. These assaults against humanity go on daily here just as they do elsewhere; in the Congress, at the U.N., in Embassies, in war as well as in the classroom. And you let it. And if you let it go on in a dormitory when you are here, won't you let it go on in Viet Nam? Won't you find yourself doing it there if you did it here? Sure you will...The horrors of Viet Nam began when the men in power were very young....The battle of Waterloo was won, that old wisdom said, on the playing fields of Eaton. Well then, the mistakes of Viet Nam began on the banks of the Potomac, and at Yale and Harvard with Walt Rostow, and McBundy and Bob McNamara and Cyrus Vance. So, you don't have to wait until you are sixty. Your conscience must be exercised and polished and developed at home right now..."

It's very easy to look at Washington, and her Governmental inhabitants and see them as very distant from our lives. The mistakes they made are their mistakes, not ours, and we should simply castigate those evil men of Watergate for their ill deeds, shouldn't we? Or is it not true that the same type of ethical mistakes are committed everyday around us and we either indulge in them ourselves or do nothing about them?

If you look around, you don't have to look very far to find a plethora of examples of ethical misconduct which, on our level, look very similar to the deeds of John Dean and Jeb Stuart Macruder, on their level. The fault very possibly may lie in part with us and not solely with them.

When a student lies in order to get scholarship aid, or a guy takes advantage of a girl by saying that he loves her when he really doesn't, or a student explicitly or implicitly cheats on an exam, the same types of scruples are being used as in the Watergate affair. Perhaps Schriver was right in saying that those sorts of errors of conscience begin in places just like this and very possibly it is a place like this that can put a stop to them.

In order to defeat the forces of evil which putrify our government, perhaps we must put our own ship in order by considering the way in which we as students and faculty live our lives. The same lusts for pwer can be seen in student government here as at anytime in Washington. And...if we let it go on in a dormitory when we are here, won't we let it go on later in life? Won't we do it then if we do it now? Sure we will..., to paraphrase Schriver. So we must be careful as to just what we get ourselves involved in here and what ethical principles we violate in so doing. It is significant, it does matter.

There is a second aspect to this problem of character and ethics. This involves not what we do, but what we let go on around us without our interference. When a student who sees or knows of a cheating incident does nothing, when certain members of the Administration, due to existing pressures from students, for example, either reverse a decision, which they know from experience to be the correct one, or make the decision when nobody is around, the same types of "spineless" doctrine are being implemented as in the case of those young clean-cut men of Washington who did nothing.

It is time, that faculty, who by their training know how excellence is obtained, (hard work) took a hard line against that mass of "students" who are presently cluttering up our classrooms and desire to do no work at all. When long, exacting memorization is necessary, require it, don't apologize and make up "cute" excuses for it. The time has come when we must have the "spine" to stand up and demand excellence and not accept any substitutes.

I remember this summer listening to Howard Baker's cross-examination of Herbert Porter, one of the young clean-cuts, when after Porter had said, "I was not the one to stand up and object to dirty tricks...I kind of drafted along," Baker probingly asked, "Where does the system breakdown, when concern for what is right as opposed to what is legal, is never asserted and never thought about, and you do not standup and sy 'no'?" Porter responded, "In all honesty, probably because of the fear of group pressure that would ensure and of not being a teamplayer."

It is time that we, as students and faculty, thought about whether we stand up or not to things that are wrong. The concept of a "teamplayer" in an institution of learning only leads us on to the abyss of mediocre education. We must assert ourselves, in the classroom for excellence in academics, in the dormitory for compassion and respect for our fellow man, in the Administration for a determined decision making process, where a decision is not reversed due to pressure group action. So I ask you to assert your own feeling for what is right and not to "just drift along." The crimes of Watergate are not very different than the types of typically 'spineless' behavior that we all see everyday. In closing, "Buddy, can you dare a spine?"

Exploitation of blindness cruel

To The Editor:

From time to time various well-meaning individuals become involved in the collection of bottle tops, beer cans, lids, and a number of other such items. They do this following some kind of rumor that the collection of a certain number of labels, tops, or stamps will provide blind persons with dog guides who otherwise would not be able to have them. The individuals involved in the collection of such items end up with a roomful of items and then they try to cash them in and find that there is no such program for making dog guides available.

I believe this is a cruel hoax and although denied by the companies involved and their advertising agencies one cannot but suspect that the impression is dropped someplace that the purchase of the article will help some blind people. This is a fraud; there is no such program and the collection of any kind of labels or bottle tops will not provide blind people with dog guides. There are established agencies who will either provide a dog guide free to an individual who is blind or will permit him to buy the dog for a token payment on a very easy installment basis. There is absolutely no need for this kind of exploitation of blindness.

You will note that Joan Crawford has a prepared radio spot announcement which is heard nationally bringing attention of the public to this hoax. If anyone wishes further confirmation of the futility of collection of such articles, they may contact Mr. Lester Stott of this office at 727-5550. Mr. Stott's office is at 39 Boylston Street, Boston, Massachusetts 02116.

Corp. statement refudiated

To The Editor:

Buried a few paragraphs down in the Corp. statement in yesterday's Collegian was the following: "We know all about those mines in South Africa where our Sisters and Brothers are being enslaved. Yea, we know that one of Israel's chief industries is diamond cutting and polishing. The link is quite obvious."

I am sick of seeing Israel and the Jewish People libeled in the name of Third World Unity.

Below is listed the dollar value of exports to and imports from South Africa by various Middle Eastern countries in the period 1967-1971 (the most recent data available):

Country	Exports	Imports
Saudi Arabia	873,429,000	13,384,000
Libya	526,599,000	34,198,000
Morocco	119,034,000	121,714,000
Kuwait	179,120,000	10,332,000
Iraq	227,957,000	17,258,000
Egypt	92,746,000	118,758,000
Algeria	80,248,000	104,231,000
Israel	48,255,000	16,933,000

(Data from Yearbook of International Trade Statistics. UN: New York. 1973)

It should be mentioned that in this same time period Israel was training the armed forces of Black African nations, armies that will eventually liberate South Africa.

Any trade with the racist regime of South Africa is too much trade; my intention is neither to exonerate Israel nor to discredit the Third World Movement. Rather, I condemn the Selective morality of individuals who see Israeli injustices but are blind to those of her enemies.

Many Jews are committed to the establishment of social justice, both in America and the Middle East. Social justice demands the creation of a Palestinian Arab State side by side with Israel. Social justice also demands economic compensation to all Middle East regugees. This includes the 750,000 Jews who, stripped of their possessions, left the Arab World for Israel in the wake of the street violence and intimidation that followed the 1948 war.

Social justice demands more than lip service be paid to the ideals of socialism in the Middle East. It demands a commitment to finding uses for the vast wealth of the region other than creating militarized societies and a few individual fortunes.

Finally, social justice demands the end of blind partisanship, as evidenced in the Corp. statement, and a willingness to come to grips with the problems and aspirations of the Jewish and Arab Peoples.

Bum tingling blues

To The Editor:

One person's humor may not be all laffs to another...& the Solomon-Incarnate at the Northampton Dicktricks Court edged on reality as he mused: "What is indecent to one person is not to another..."

Barely escaping jail on the wings of a Nev-R-Fail-Bail-Liberty-Loan from the First-Fast-Ed-Vadas-Big-City-Blueband-Bank, I returned to Umieville's Orchard Hill, had a rare evening's concert and a fine weekend visit.

Given my druthers, I'd rather be abducted & set free by the Real World Court than chance being "pennied" in an Orchard Hill room...or, not every apple tree grows a peach or a plum!

I'm left in a total blush: My only crime in 30 years living was to let last Friday's sun tingle my bum!

SWP provides choices

To The Editor:

With the "energy crisis" reaching ever larger proportions, one also finds that the government's rhetoric is escalating. One of the most common official explanations of the energy crisis is that the American people have had it too good. With disintegrating cities, rising inflation, pollution, etc., I am sure most of us find that hard to believe. Since campaign time is drawing near, Mass. voters can soon expect a new line of phony campaign promises from the Democrats and Republicans; perhaps "freeze with honor" will be this year's motto. Certainly the Democratic and Republican parties have shown themselves time after time to be incapable of solving the problems that the American people face. Thousands of people are fed up with empty promises and are looking for an alternative — the Socialist Workers Party campaign provides such an alternative.

Don Gurewitz of the SWP is running for governor and will be speaking in the Campus Center, rm. 164, tonight at 8:00. I invite every person tired of the deception of the Democratic and Republican parties to attend and to consider this candidate as a viable alternative to the mouthpieces of capitalism. Speaking with him will be Debbie Bustin, former anti-war activist placed on Nixon's No. 1 enemy list, co-chairperson of the national SWP Campaign 74 Committee, and a major plaintiff in a law suit filed against the U.S. government and its agencies on behalf of the Socialist Workers Party and the Young Socialist Alliance. The suit challenges the government's right to engage in wire taps, burglary, surveillance, mail tampering, and sabotage. Support for this legal action is being organized by the Political Rights Defense Fund (PRDF.) She will speak on Watergate and the energy crisis as well as PRDF.

The Democratic and Republican politicans, and the mass media which supports them, are speaking of a return to the fifties, when young people were "seen and not heard." But issues like Watergate, inflation, and the artificially created energy crisis make it clearer than ever that we must remain vocal and active in demanding real social change.

Vote Socialist Workers in 74!

Roasting Richard

"Good evening, ladies and gentlemen. My name is Mike Mansfield, and I'd like to welcome you tonight as the 'Senators' roast Richard Nixon. Yes, it's a rare occassion and it promises to be a night of fun and laughs, as various senators will spend the night poking fun at our beloved president. And who knows? By the end of the show, we might even have a new president to roast. So without further adieu, let's get on with the roasting as NBC presents:

'The Impeachment Show'

Tonight's guests will be; Sam Ervin, Lowell Wiecker, Hubert Humphrey, Ted Kennedy, and special guest Senator George McGovern. We'll continue after a word from our sponsor."

"Do you really care about your country? Do you want to see a better America? Well so do we, and we've been working hard for years to help America reach its full potential. So next time it seems like America is getting you down, remember...'You deserve a break today, so get out and get away, to MacDonalds.'"

"Well it's back to the show, and I'm sure all of you are as anxious as we are to see it get underway, so let me introduce to you a long-time member of 'the Senators Club', Senator Sam Ervin. Come on out here, Sam."

"Why thank you kindly, Mike. Gee, I've been waiting for this for a long time. You know, I was hoping I'd still be in office by the time this came around, and here I am. But really, I'd just like to say that I've known Dick Nixon for years, and he really is a louse. Back in North Carolina, we wouldn't allow people like him to walk around unless they had a license and a collar. But all kidding aside, I really like Dick, but I think I'd like him a lot more if he was out of office. Now I guess I'm supposed to introduce our next guest, so here he is, my esteemed colleague and the life of the party — the Republican Party that is — Senator Lowell Wiecker."

"Thank you very much, Sam, you old codger. Well, they asked me to come out and say a few words about Richard Nixon, so I will. Richard Nixon is a foul, detestable, untrustworthy, and just incredibly dishonest jerk."

"Do you think that's necessary, Lowell?"

"Yes I do Sam, and if we weren't on television, I'd say a few more things. I mean, how else is a maverick supposed to act? But I guess I'm running out of time, so I'd like to introduce to you that jovial king of mediocrity, Senator Hubert Humphrey."

"Why thank you, Lowell. First off, I'd like to say that President Nixon is a bad man, and I think that if the senators here tonight agree that Richard Nixon should be kicked out, then they would all be in agreement, but if they don't agree about that, then they would not be in agreement, and President Nixon is a bad man. Gee, that felt good...Oh, am I supposed to introduce someone?...Oh alright, here's Teddy."

"Thank you, thank you, thank you. You know there's an old saying in Washington that goes, 'Never trust a junkie, a cop or Dick Nixon.' Well I guess that's proven to be true with one minor clarification — a junkie will rip you off and a cop will bust you, but they let you know about it when they're doing it. You can't say the same about Tricky Dick. Well I guess my time's just about up, and in case you were wondering, I'm not going to run for president in 1976, so just get that thought right out of your minds 'cause I'm not going to run. And now, here's Mike Mansfield again."

"Thank you Ted. We know you're not going to run. And talking about running for president, our next guest has just gotten over going just that. Yes folks, here he is, our special guest, Senator George McGovern."

"Hi, I'm George McGovern. You might think I sound like someone else, but I've never played piano in my life. Really though, there's not much you can say about our president that isn't simply despicable. And frankly, I'd prefer not to talk about him. I mean, after all those bombs he dropped in Southeast Asia, it looks like he's finally bombed out himself. If you'll remember, I was against the war back in 1963, not that it did me any good in 1972, but that's beside the point. Concerning Nixon, I understand he had my phone tapped at the Watergate Hotel. Well I'd just like to say that I know nothing about the numbers racket. Those were just my laundry numbers. That's all they were. But really, the Senate has no choice by to impeach Richard Nixon. His crimes against the nation are beyond belief and he's done a great injustice to the American people. And who said revenge wasn't sweet? Now it's time to go back to the floor and the impeachment proceedings, but before we do, here's another word from our sponsor."

"Things are rough today, and the fuel crisis is still at the front of everyone's mind, and we'd just like to say that we're trying and we'll keep trying to beat this crisis before gas prices go up too much further. We realize its hard on the consumer, but we won't allow gas prices to go past a dollar a gallon. At Exxon, we're trying."

"Welcome back to 'The Impeachment Show'. I think we're about to get the final vote on whether or nor Richard M. Nixon will be allowed to keep on serving as President of the United States. And here are the results...Yes, it now appears that next week, the 'Senators' will have another guest to roast — President Gerald R. Ford. So until next week, remember our motto, 'If at first you don't succeed,...'"

Beasties at UMass

A Dr. Johnson once said, "He who makes a beast of himself gets rid of the pain of being a man."

UMass can be one hell of a lonely place sometimes. And sometimes it can be a horror show with hassles lurking around every corner and people jumping off of towers and falling down elevator shafts.

Yeah, there comes a time in every good UMie's life when he or she either has to get out of here, face life in an insane asylum or take up serious drinking.

Drinking can be great. It allows you to let it all hang out, whether what you want to hang out is violence or hate or love or warmth.

When you're drunk it's easier to pick a fight or say "I like you."

And everybody drinks, everybody gets sick once in a while, everybody blacks out at times. What the hell?

The good, old fun-filled beer-drinking days are back! Let's see how shit-faced we can get this weekend!

It was about a year and a half ago that people on campus started to drink more heavily and more often. It was a game who could drink the most Harvey Wallbangers in one night? It was even fun to share the hangover feeling the next day with friends who had joined you the night before.

Maybe the whole thing is part of the nostalgia trip making the rounds or maybe people are tired of mind-bending drugs or maybe people need a new outlet for feelings because political activism has become a thing of the past. Whatever, heavy drinking is here.

Alcoholism is a lousy word. It doesn't really mean anything in particular. In medical jargon it means physical addiction to alcohol.

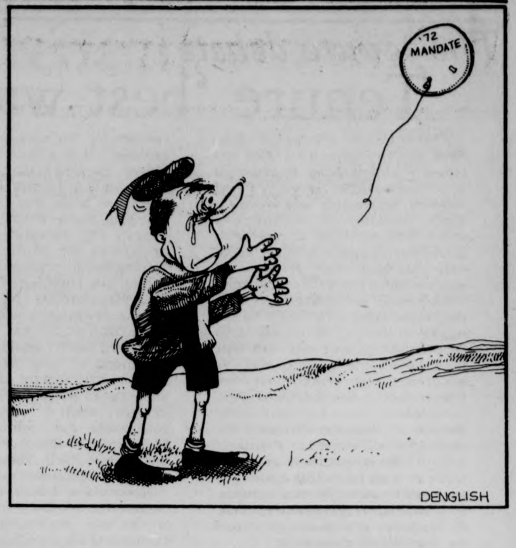
In this society the stereotype for an alcoholic might be one of three people: the bum lying face down on Boston Common with a wine bottle wrapped in a brown paper bag stuffed in his pocket; the nine to five o'clock business executive who needs four Manhattans to unwind every afternoon or the bored housewife.

College students can't identify with them. But there are probably a few college students around who drink but don't really enjoy it and who are no longer able to successfully use alcohol as a channel through which they release feelings, but who keep on drinking.

At UMass you can't escape the pressure to drink. It's at every party and every get-together. Do you really want the drink you take?

Room To Move is a place that everyone jokes about probably because the things they deal with there hit so close to home.

The alcohol team there doesn't think that anyone is an alcoholic. They do hope, however, that each person who drinks will ask themselves if his or her drinking behavior is what he or she really wants it to be. There are people at Room To Move to talk with and to answer questions.



Deep Throat not hard to swallow

By PAT COFFEY

Deep Throat is not pornography. Pornography is sly, it's insidious. Deep Throat is forthright and that makes it just everyday obscene. But in it's obscenity the movie has it's redeeming social value. The movie you have heard so much about is not all it was cracked up to be. It is not a menace to the community and morals that will pervert our minds and redirect our wholesome, but discreet sexuality to the evils and debasement of fellatio.

Pardon me for setting up a straw man to blow down, but there was a reactionary furor over the whole issue of 'Pornography — Threat or Menace', and much of it centered on this film. Deep Throat was seized, it was banned, it was picketed and protested. It was also a consistent sellout at outrageous prices everywhere it played. People wanted to see it. In part because of the furor, in part because it is one of the very few hard-core sex movies that is relatively well made. Well made relative to an industry that has low standards of quality.

Deep Throat has a kinky story line, a real plot; the unfortunate girl with a clitoris in her throat has to seek satisfaction somehow. It has an original music score with tremendous orchestration...all the crescendos come at the right time. And the close-up photography even had some artsy touches with cuts to rockets taking off and fireworks exploding. But, if instead of dealing with fellatio, this film had been about a girl whose burning desire was to grow white crysanthemums, your grandmother wouldn't have gone to see it. It just wasn't that well done.

Most people in the audience reflected the let down. A capacity crowd, set up such a chant, a clapping demand for the film, that it began seven minutes early. That enthusiasm waned. As the film wore on the whistles and catcalls died down. Linda got a round of applause when she finally did her thing and her partner said "I don't believe she ate the whole thing." It coasted to a half after an hour and ten minutes. An unenthused audience shuffled out quietly. It was worth the effort to see it. The crowd was hyped before it began, and would have crashed through a police barricade to get in to see it, but they left, quiet and unenthused.

In that is it's value. Deep Throat, the biggest of the hard-core sex-with-all-it's-menace films that has been so hotly debated, banned, and picketed, wasn't a satisfying movie. I think that is a great redeeming value. It completely blows all the hassle, makes absurd, all the effort that was expended to repress the film. It makes a parody out of all the attention it got.

And the film itself was a sort of tongue in cheek parody, if you'll excuse the expression. It was genuinely funny as it satirized itself and so our responses, both pro and con. What was forced down our throats was a great statement for freedom of press and publication. The media, if left alone, will seek it's own market. The most resounding line of the evening was from the first man out the door, as the show ended he was heard to mutter, "This show sucks!"

The tenure debate

Tenure 'best way' at UMass

What is tenure? Who gets it? Why have it? Why have it? Critics say tenure -- guaranteeing employment to professors after seven years of teaching, scholarship, and service -- limits flexibility in staffing and stifles natural drifts in academic disciplines. Supporters hail it as an essential guarantee freedom of expression for University professors.

Wednesday the Collegian printed the first of three brief essays on the nature of tenure, in an effort to describe its benefits and liabilities for students and to stake out the areas of disagreement between UMass faculty and administrators.

Yesterday, Union College Provost William F. Enteman discussed the institution's "contract system." Today UMass political scientist Loren P. Beth advocates a policy of traditional tenure on this campus. Prof. Beth has taught here since 1958. He has been active in the ACLU and the local AAUP chapter.

Arguments for and against tenure quotas (or the limitation of the proportion of faculty having tenure) must be approached by looking at the reasons for, and the effects of, tenure. These questions are, unfortunately, usually considered superficially and partially, and thus succeed in spreading more heat than light. Few people today argue explicitly against the existence of tenure itself; but most arguments for tenure quotas amount to arguments against tenure itself, once their logic is granted. Therefore I wish to consider the reasons why tenure has become accepted in American colleges and universities.

Tenure grew up originally because of a concern for the academic freedom of the professor. It is a little like life tenure for judges: the idea is that a judge can act independently of politics if he can't be fired. The same holds true for professors once they gain tenure--which usually takes seven years. The temptation to discharge professors for political or ideological reasons has often proved too great to resist if they are unprotected by tenure rights. Thus the possibility of a faculty containing diverse viewpoints would be reduced to the extent that tenure was unavailable, since untenured faculty would be under pressure to conform or "ship out."

While most faculty and enlightened administrators accept the above points, many of them tend to assume that in this enlightened age political pressures no longer exist, or that they are less dangerous than tenure itself. These are in my view recklessly dangerous assumptions.

Opponents of tenure often seem also to assume that academic freedom is the only, or the only legitimate, reason for the existence of tenure. Thus they imply that if academic freedom could be protected in some other way there would be no justification for tenure. Such an argument is vastly oversimplified, since there are other functions which tenure fulfills.

One of these obviously is that it provides the only approach to economic security that a professor can obtain. While job security is never absolute, it is normally provided both in large corporations for executives (provided they are reasonably competent) and also under seniority rules in unionized industries. Without tenure a professor holds his job at the pleasure of his administration, which in turn holds his livelihood in its hands. The trade-off for years of competent service is, simply, the security provided by the tenure system.

A third reason for tenure is that it is clearly the humane way to treat human beings. It is not humane to hold a perpetual sword of Damocles over anyone, and the seven-year probation rule seems quite long enough. Even five-year contracts provide no kind of psychological security. It is quite possible that by the time a professor--even one of great competence--reaches (for example) age 55, his university could find better or more up-to-date juior-level people to replace him.

But what would this do to the senior man? His years of institutional commitment would be set at naught, his roots would be torn up, and he would find it difficult or impossible to secure another position--all for a dubious and possibly only temporary marginal gain to the university. Since even those who are now young would eventually find themselves in the same situation, the entire academic world would turn into a dog-eat-dog competition, and the expected employable life of any single person would be short, especially considering the economic savings to the university in hiring only young people and then not keeping them.

It should, too, be obvious that the university gains, as do its students, from the tenure system. Without tenure, professors would be subjected to constant pressures for research and publication beyond anything we know now, simply because this is the most effective way to achieve and retain the professional visibility which they would need if they hoped to keep their positions or find new ones.

The result would be less attention to teaching and to students, less willingness to commit oneself to institutional goals and norms, and less willingness to spend time on university service, since the rewards for these endeavors would be doubtful at best and non-existent at worst. It is always difficult to identify and retain good teachers; the weakening or elimination of tenure would make it even more difficult.

Finally, regarding tenure quotas specifically, they would have the inevitable effect of creating a two-class system in which some young professors would be on "tenure track" appointments while others would not. There is an unpleasant assumption that the letter would be inferior to the former: but if that were so, would we want to hire them at all? The morale problems of such a system would be considerable, the difficulty of hiring really good young professors perhaps insurmountable, and the ostensible purpose--to induce flexibility and new ideas--unlikely of fulfillment. The profession would come to seem unattractive to potential scholars. On the other hand, if the "non-tenure track" professors were as good as, or superior to, their colleagues, it would be difficult to justify the denial of tenure to them.

The benefits of tenure are real, substantial, and known. In my view the probability -- often used as a scare tactic -- of having a faculty all of whom are on tenure is extremely unlikely. But even were it to happen, the advantages of tenure are so great that they outweight those which might be achieved by eliminating it or by instituting quotas.

DEVELOPMENT:

Free privates

BOSTON (AP) - Leaders of the Massachusetts legislature and Atty. Gen. Robert H. Quinn testified yesterday in favor of a bill to suspend environmental impact laws for private developers.

Senate President Kevin B. Harrington, who filed the bill, said Massachusetts Industry is "coming to a standstill" and that jobs and taxes are being lost as a result of poor implementation of the laws.

He said the interpretation of the statute by the Department of Natural Resources "makes it absolutely impossible for major private developers in Massachusetts to build anything at all."

House Speaker David M. Bartley said "delay and delay highlighted by legalistic acrobatics" by the governor's office have resulted in a failure to promulgate standards for implementation of the law.

"The problem is not with the law itself; it is with an administration crippled by bureacratic infighting," he said.

Submit mini-city

WARREN, (AP) - A planned community development proposal here will be sent to the federal Department of Housing and Urban Development with a request for financial assistance, says one of the project's planners.

Mrs. Doris Wright of Warren Western Community Corp. said Tuesday the project would be submitted to HUD once a developer is found.

The corporation is hoping to build a so-called "mini-city" of up to 15,000 in this town of 3,000.

Warren Western Community Corps developed its plan after Carabetta Enterprises Inc. of Meriden, Conn., abandoned its plan for a community of 30,000.

Carabetta sold off its options after HUD turned down a similar funding request.

HUD officials cited unprecedented local opposition in rejecting the Carabetta request.

Selectman Chairman J. Walter Perrin predicted Tuesday that the new proposal would meet a similar fate..

"The same feelings will prevail." Perrin said.

Earlier this month Warren residents overwhelmingly opposed the proposed mini-city in an advisory referendum.

Property problems that plague tenants

By RICHARD M. HOWLAND
Attorney For Students

The law and you

There are a variety of problems that can come about when renting or leasing property, that both tenants and landlords should understand.

The most obvious catastrophe involves heat and, incidentally, hot water. Contrary to some tenants' views, the landlord is as anxious about loss of heating services as the occupant. In a very short time, lack of heat may result in damage to property which is very costly to repair. Consequently, even the most inconsiderate landlord wants the heating in order.

Lack of heat is also a code defect in residential housing which gives jurisdiction to building and housing inspectors to promptly identify and order corrections of heating problems. Failure to effect prompt repairs give the tenant access to a variety of remedies.

As with most landlord-tenant problems, the first step at correction is direct contact between the parties. If any legal action is considered in severe cases, all complaints are better if made in writing even when a phone call is made first. If you feel the landlord is not responding reasonably to a non-emergency type of problem, consider going to the Amherst Landlord-Tenant Relations Committee (if in Amherst) or consult the local building-housing inspector for advice.

The propostion that is now the rule in Massachusetts can be stated as follows:

> In rental of any premises for dwelling purposes, whether by lease, written or oral, for the specific time or at will, there is an implied warranty that the premises are fit for human habitation.

The effect of such an "implied warranty" is that at the inception of the tenancy there are no latent or patent defects in facilities vital to the use of the premises for residence purposes and that the condition will remain so for the duration of occupancy. Provisions of the State Sanitary Code and the health regulations apply and cannot be waived no matter what a lease says!

In the event that premises become unfit for habitability the Chief Justice suggests some remedies for the tenant:

1. Suit against the landlord to terminate the lease at the point in time when the reach of warranty arose; or

2. Withholding up to 2 month's rent after a housing inspector or other official certifies that a violation that "may endanger or materially impair the health or safety" of occupants if not corrected within 21 days; or

3. Withholding rent after certification of such a danger or material threat to health or safety pursuant to Chapter 239, section 8A after written notice to the landlord in accordance with the statute (which is somewhat complicated).

Any withholding of rent may properly result in considerable litigation and statutory formulas are specific and must be followed closely in order to be sure of success. The conditions of fitness must be certifiably bad; notice must be given to the landlord together with adequate time to repair; and then the tenant is subject to suits by the landlord to redress his losses. Rent wihholding is an effective and important tool in many instances. It is not, however, simple now should it be considered as the primary remedy. It is much more a last resort and should be done carefully in accordance with law.

All tenants who are planning to terminate their tenancies at the end of the semester are warned that most courts do not look very kindly on late arising complaints about apartments that have been tolerated all year. In other words, if you plan to end your tenancy the end of May it is wiser to do it for justifiable cause when the cause occurs, or else according to law and good practice.

Tenants who do not have leases are reminded to give at least a month's notice before the rent is due in order to avoid an additional month's rent. Tenants with leases should promptly arrange for subleasing with the landlord's approval or risk the loss of deposits and considerable liability for rent.

Timing is important in lawfullv terminating lease. Most Amherst area landlords have had students as tenants for years and really do know what is going on and have various methods of dealing with it without damage to themselves. Needless to say students do not usually win by using the same ploys as their predecessors. What really works, most of the time and with most of the landlords, is the straightforward approach. Tell the landlord or landlady what your problems are and they can probably help you out without economic damage to you. Mostly, I think, they hate surprises even when they make money out of it.

As always, tenants with problems are advised to contact my office before a problem becomes a catastrophe. I hope to be well and back at work when vacation ends.

Miranda challenged

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Supreme Court was urged yesterday to adopt a flexible standard for applying its 1966 Miranda decision requiring that criminal suspects be fully informed of their legal rights.

The argument was advanced by an Oakland County, Mich., prosecutor in an attempt to preserve the conviction of a man convicted of rape after his own statements produced damaging testimony against him.

Lower federal courts overturned the conviction of Thomas W. Tucker on the basis of the Miranda decision. They ruled that he had not been properly advised of his rights as required by the Miranda decision.

UMass production enjoyable, not great

By FRED WEISS
MDC Critic

When Oscar Wilde first wrote The Importance of Being Earnest towards the end of the 19th Century, he intended it to be a satirical comedy concerning the mores of Victorian England. The plot centers around the adventures and "secret lives" of two middle class gentleman, and explores the pretentions of both themselves and the society within which they live.

Mr. John Worthing, a country gentleman with a ward and an estate, escapes both by going to London regularly to see his fictional rascal of a brother "Earnest". In London, he takes on the role of Earnest Worthing, as he carries on in London high society. While there he keeps company with another young gentleman named Algernon Moncrieff, and in time fails in love with Algernon's cousin Gwendolyn. Algernon enjoys escaping the pressures of society as well, and frequently leaves London to visit his dear ficticious friend "Bunbury", who lives conveniently "in bad health".

Wilde's main point against Victorian Society seems to be that it was more concerned with style that substance. How names sounded; or how people looked, was more important than what kind of person someone was, or what kind of mind could be found behind a certain name. In this play the key name is "Earnest". The name is used to free Jack from the Country in the first place. It is also used to win the heart of Algeron's cousin, whom he fears is more in love with his taken-on name than with him.

When Algernon finds out that Jack has an attractive young ward ir the country, he schemes to meet her. Passing himself off as Jack's mischeiving brother "Earnest", he gains entry into the estate, and finds that his "wild" image has captured the heart of Jack's ward Cecily.....before she ever met him. On hearing this he immediately proposes marriage, and she accepts.

When Algernon's cousin Gwendolyn comes to the estate to see the "first" Earnest (Jack), who has also proposed to her, and finds out that a certain Earnest Worthing has also proposed to Cecily the plot begins to get interesting. All these events lead up to a quick moving third and final act.

Despite certain structural problems (for one the first act, and subsequently the entire show is just too long) for the most part the show is good one. Wilde's wit is usually well portrayed on stage by a cast that has obviously put a lot of time into rehearsal for the production (four months).

Wilde's dialogue is so tight that in order for the subtle wit to be appreciated by the audience to the fullest extent two things have to happen: The first concerns the timing of the actors-it must be next to perfect. If the actors are nervous and rush their lines, it throws off the sense of irony that Wilde is trying so hard to portray. The second factor concerns the audience; for if they are tired or cranky (collectively speaking), they will throw off the mood of the production, and in a way, hurt the timing as well.

All things considered the cast members portray their characters with enough realism to be considered credible, yet enough humor to be interesting. Of the supporting cast, Thomas Keegan shines through for his portrayal of Lady Bracknel (Gwendolyn's mother) who is the epitome of Victorian pretentiousness and propriety. Margery Gram and Debbie Gibbs are fine, although not memorable, as Gwendolyn and Cecily respectively.

After a rough first act, in which he seemed to be a bit nervous and frequently rushed his lines, Mark Cuddy (as Jack Worthing) got better and better as the show went on. Perhpas this week, when the show is performed four more times Cuddy will have better composure from the start. When Cuddy is nervous, he personifies a quick talking vaudeville performer; however when he is is relaxed he is terrific. It is he who steals the third act, due as much to his performance, as to the lines provided for by Oscar Wilde.

However without reservations Alan Kurtz, as Algernon Moncrief is the star of the show. Kurtz combines composure with timely delivery consistantly to make the energy of the production move towards him for most of the show. Perhaps Mark Cuddy's uneasiness at the start would not have been so noticeable had not Alan Kurtz seemed so at home in his role. Kurtz's performance is worth the price of admission in itself.

The Importance of Being Earnest, is not a great play: It is however, a good show and an enjoyable night at the theatre. The show would be even better if Marya Bednerik, the Director could find a way to cut a few lines out of the first act. Of course Oscar Wilde would probably turn over in his grave, but that is the price one must pay for improvement; and besides like they say. "That's show bizz."

The Importance of Being Earnest runs this week, Tuesday thru Friday, at 8 p.m. in Bartlett Auditorium. Tuesday is Dollar Night where all seats are unreserved and $1.

Marijuana laws eased?

BOSTON (AP) - The Social Welfare Committee is expected to reject a dozen bills next week aimed at easing marijuana penalties.

Rep. Michael F. Flaherty (D-Boston) said the committee voted Tuesday 12 to 6 against a bill legalizing possession, for personal use, of one ounce of marijuana. He said the committee voted to have all members polled on remaining marijuana bills.

Flaherty said he expects the vote will be "about the same" on the other bills which deal with studies,

Sargent asks $60m extra in dramatic spending shifts

BOSTON (AP) - Gov. Francis W. Sargent asked the legislature yesterday to approve a $60 million deficiency budget for the current fiscal year and add $18 million to the proposed state budget for next year.

Specific proposals in the governor's request represent dramatic reversals in administration policy.

Sargent recommended full funding for certain local aid programs that were previously ignored.

He also proposed to pay for the appropriations he requested Wednesday largely through an across-the-board 6.5 per cent cut in his budget requests for the next fiscal year, fiscal 1975. Such a cut was proposed two years ago but was flatly rejected by the administration.

Secretary of Administration William I. Cowin said at a news briefing that Sargent's new budget requests will not require new taxes.

Included in the request is more than $11 million this year and next to reimburse communities for property tax losses due to state owned land. Another $12.8 million is provided for school transportation reimbursements owed to communities by the state.

"We've changed our minds on these local aid questions," Cowin said.

The administration has been under considerable pressure from local officials to change its mind. But Cowin denied that politics accounted for the change.

He said, however, that "There's no doubt that representations of local officials...have made it apparent to us that they were disenchanted with our local aid policy."

Other items in the deficiency include $24 million for the Welfare Department's Aid to Families with Dependent Children program.

So far, $2.5 billion has been appropriated during this fiscal year, which ends June 30.

Proposed increases in the fiscal 1975 budget, which is still before the legislature, would bring that bill to $2.808 billion.

Gov't slows push for ethnic survey

CONCORD, N.H. (AP) - Threatened by Gov. Meldrim Thomson with a court battle, the federal government has backed down on guidelines for an ethnic survey.

Thomson released a letter Tuesday from an official of the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission saying New Hampshire could "obtain this information in whatever manner it finds most practical."

The survey, based on the U.S. Civil Rights Act, prohibited any agency head from asking an employe what race or ethnic group he or she belonged to, but asked for a visual determination to supply the information.

The letter released Tuesday was dated Jan. 25 and was signed by Melvin Humphrey, director of office research for the commission.

"I wish to correct a misunderstanding," Humphrey said. "The commission has taken the position that it does not encourage such direct inquiry because of the sensitive nature of the relationship between the supervisor and the persons who are supervised.

"However, it does not prohibit it when it is not utilized for purposes of discrimination.

"We are aware of the fact that some state and local governments were obtaining racial information by direct inquiry for their own purposes."

"The instructions of the federal agency are typically inane," Thomson said last fall in instructing state officials to describe employes only as "American."

In a letter to the commission Sept. 24, Thomson said, "We have your complicated, obtuse and incomprehensible guidelines for preparing an Equal Opportunity Employment form to be filled out and filed by Oct. 31.....

"If you want a breakdown on the background of our American employes, then I suggest you let us find out by the simple method of asking or letting them volunteer the information."

When the agency insisted on "full compliance" in December, Thomson replied, "I can think of no happier solution to this senseless problem created by bureaucratic bumbling than to refer it to your general counsel for action.

"I have referred the entire matter to our attorney general, who stands ready with me to meet your general counsel in the federal courts."

Vita on Channel 57

The Volunteer Income Tax Assistance Program (VITA), sponsored by the Center for Outreach Programs at UMass will be discussed March 22 at 10:30 p.m. on "Open Door," a program of Channel 57, public television for Western Massachusetts.

The VITA program, first offered on the UMass campus in 1973, trains students to prepare federal and state tax returns, and then provides an opportunity for students to use these skills assisting people in various Western Massachusetts communities.

Providing free tax assistance last year, VITA saved an 3stimated $30,000 for the nearly 2,700 persons, mostly low-income and elderly residents, who sought help. The Outreach program provides this free tax assistance through student volunteers, who may earn academic credit for their help.

Richard Sockol, VITA coordinator, feels that "this year's VITA program should be at least twice as productive as lastyear's."

In the summer of 1972, Outreach Director William Burke, after conferring with various community leaders, contacted the Internal Revenue Service, requesting VITA be offered at UMass. Instructors from the IRS and the Massachusetts Department of Taxation trained UMass students.

According to 1973 statistics of the IRS office in Boston, about 2,000 VITA volunteers, students and others, had been trained throughout the state, with the UMass program the largest in terms of numbers of volunteers, 150.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

The Fire signs love to eat and their appetites can be an inspiration to any creative chef. The Fire signs are Aries, Leo and Sagittarius and they adore an appetizer which is out-of-the-ordinary, such as Welsh Rarebit. Try it with beer or white wine. Beat an egg yolk with Tabasco and Worcestershire sauce--stir this into butter and cheese which is deliciously melting in the beer or wine. If there is an Aries, Leo or Sagittarius within running distance, the concoction will not remain long for this world.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Sun has entered your sign; this is the Vernal Equinox. You get inspiration from one who previously seemed selfish. Now you can influence people and gain a significant audience. Move forward. Don't become addicted to secret fears, doubts. Important person will back you.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You seem able now to discern, to sense in an "extra" manner. Trust what you feel. Where there was dark dankness, there can be light, freshness and hope. Some of your hopes and wishes will be realized. Know it and maintain air of optimism.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Ambition can be achieved if you are versatile, flexible and willing to work with materials available. Sagittarius person could play significant role. Set sights on goal. Social encounter leads to meaningful action. You may be asked to assume added responsibility.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Get down to business. Accent the factual. Leave the daydreams for another time, another place. Display determination. You have a right to be stubborn if it means sticking to basic course. Message will become increasingly clear.

LEO (July 23-Aug.22): Bring forth creative resources. What seems a setback is due to boomerang--in your favor. You receive inquiry concerning price and availability. Don't sell yourself short. Arrangements can be made to accomodate special requirements.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Money due on special agreement is center of discussion, attention. Include family member where final decisions are concerned. Diplomatic approach works best--listen, observe and learn. Partner, mate is involved.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Resurgence of vitality could occur. You can be more selective. Perfect techniques; get rid of superfluous material. Get accounting. Take inventory. One concerned with the occult intrigues--but don't accept on surface indications. Dig deeper for additional information.

SCORPIO (Oct 23-Nov. 21): This can be "Power period." Your requests have clout. Persons previously indifferent will sit up and take notice. Personal magnetism is intensified. Capricorn, Cancer individuals could play significant roles. Go after what you need.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Your base of appeal broadens. You receive inquiries from varied sources. Travel opportunity may be considered. Basic changes occur and they are likely to be favorable. Aries, Libra persons could be in picture.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): One who sang old tune will now come up with fresh proposal. Be attentive. Take advantage of valid opportunity. Leo, Aquarius persons figure prominently. Short trip could be necessitated. Be flexible. Check appointment schedule.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Questions concerning collections, money, personal possessions are featured. Consolidate. Get bills, papers in order; clean files. Be ready for smoother operation. One you respect will do some reviewing.

COME BACK HERE!

Dear Aggie...

Why does it matter?

Dear Aggie,

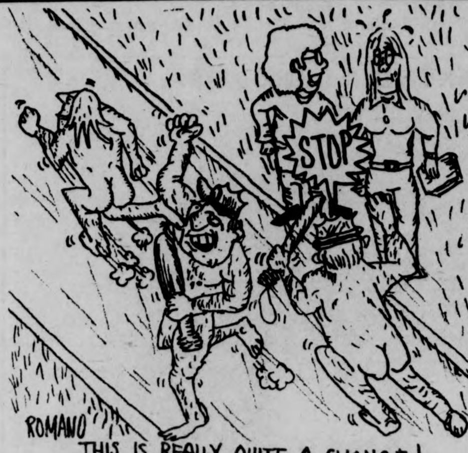
I asked by date to get somewhat "dressed up" for dinner at my friend's apartment. It seems that she lives in bluejeans and workboots, hardly suitable for the evening, I felt. After diplomatically trying to convince her to wear something else, I inadvertantly offended her by calling her a "grub". She refused to go to dinner. I realize I said a no-no, but also feel I was justified. Comments?

Dear Mud,

This is a very grave problem and a very philosophical one too. Now there are a number of situations and solutions to this situation. If the man would just not wear anything besides jeans and your friend would have been completely mortified if she had, they you have a bigger problem than I do (answering this column!) If it's a matter of principal to her, and your friend doesn't care, then why should you?

If someone told you to cut your hair because they didn't like it, would you do it? Of course, if it's you who are making a stink about the whole thing, then you should apologize for caling her a "grub" (on bended knee, of course!) and work on your most inadequate self by trying to accept people for what they are-not for what they wear. It all depends on who thinks what, whey they think that, what their priorities are and of course, the biggest thing-IF IT REALLY MATTERS! Comments?

Got a problem? Tell it to Aggie. Send letters to The Collegian.



THIS IS REALLY QUITE A CHANGE!

A BIG HIT at the Eastern gymnastics meet was Jodi Hitt, who helped UMass to the title on Friday, and tied for second on balance beam on Saturday.

John Bock

In Perspective

The collegiate wrestling season is over. With the back door victory in the NCAA by Oklahoma University it has left veteran observers like yours truly wondering what wrestling will look like next year. Or the next five.

One thing is for sure - the best wrestling is still coming out of the West and the Mid-West while the East runs an embarrassed second and regions like New England and the deep South aren't even in the running.

The monopoly that UCLA has established over collegiate basketball is nothing compared to what the Big Eight and Big Ten have done to Collegiate wrestling. In forty-four NCAA tournaments the crown of collegiate supremacy has left the Big Eight or Big Ten only three times. Cornell of Iowa won back in 1947, Northern Iowa in 1950 and Penn State University in 1953. Oklahoma State has won it 27 times alone!

What is the big secret that keeps the bulwark of wrestling out there. It's no secret but it is big money. Money that comes from being one of maybe five state supported institutions that a state has to give money to. Money that comes indirectly from being a top notch football school that appears on national TV three times a year and makes it to post season bowl games.

But how can money make a national champion out of an outstanding individual? It can give him the chance to travel where the best competition is and to want to wrestle once the season is over. It can assure him that after he finishes practice and has lost the weight he can go home and go to bed instead of having ot hike to a job or put in hours on a work study program. Wrestling is tough enough without the added diversions that putting oneself through school brings.

If all this is true then why does anyone even try and buck the force of these schools? For the same reason that someone is going to try and put down UCLA. If nobody tries then there will never be any advances. Wrestling gives a change to an outstanding individual who has managed to overcome the advantages of the big schools and rise to be a national champ. This years outstanding wrestler was Floyd (Shorty) Hitchcock from Bloomsburg State of Pennsylvania. He won the NCAA 177 pound title by pinning three of five opponents, including one twenty-five second pin in the semi-finals. He came from the sixth seeded position to win and just blew his opposition off the mats.

So what does this have to do with New England wrestling and the price of tea in China? Simply this-The wrestlers of New England have to realize that they have the same anatomical equipment that their counterparts of the Big Eight and Big Ten have. If they can slowly work their way into a good schedule they will go to the NCAAs a little better prepared. If they face wrestlers from such schools and begin beating them they will bring up their own self-confidence and the respect for wrestling in this part of the country.

It will be a long time before we in the NEUWA can even hope to approach Michigan or Oklahoma as a team in the NCAA. But we can start by preparing to give our best individuals the kind of money and training that it takes to be a national champion.

Everytime that a boy from New England returns to the NCAA's he gets a little better. There will be no guarantee that the Big Eight and Big Ten will continue to dominate if such an attitude is adopted. Maybe in ten or twenty years someone will have to put the strength of New England into perspective.

Jabbar wins NBA MVP award

NEW YORK (AP) - Kareem Abdul-Jabbar of the Milwaukee Bucks was named winner Wednesday of the National Basketball Association's Podoloff Trophy as the league's Most Valuable Player.

The 7-foot-2 center totaled 528 points to 451 for Buffalo's Bob McAdoo in balloting by players of the league's 17 member clubs. McAdoo leads the league in scoring and field goal percentage. Abdul-Jabbar is second in scoring and third in field goal shooting. Bob Lanier of Detroit finished third.

Osibissa, Gilloms are champs

By GLORIA MONTGOMERY

Those supporting Osibissa for the Intramural Basketball championship were distressed to see the sudden turn of events which compelled that they no longer participate. Osibissa employed the intimidating style of Tommy Gills who, because of his current status of ineligibility, was unable to play varsity ball for the UMass Minutemen.

Whether or not Gillams should have been allowed to play intramural ball was the issue brought to the attention of the officials AFTER Osibissa, who had made it to the finals, defeated the so-called Knicks. Osibissa, a very formidable team, decided to go all out in support of Gillams. When they decided to obtain the services of Gillams, they agreed to do so even if it meant they had to be eliminated from the playoffs. They felt that he too deserved a right to play intramural ball just as any other undergraduate student. Recognizing that he was not playing varsity ball and was a totally free agent, Osibissa came forth in making a most sacrificing offer to him. It was thus agreed on by all that Gillams would be a part of the team.

At the start of the season, Coach Kinard announced to several contenders, including the Knicks, that Gillams would be in the starting line-up for Osibissa, at which time the Knicks agreed to present no opposition with respect to the eligibility of Gillams. It was not until Osibissa began to firmly establish themselves as one of the premier teaas in the League by conquering the Knicks in the final playoffs, that the Knicks, who obviously coundn't bear the trauma of losing, informed Osibissa of their agreement to protest in the event that they lost. Shortly thereafter, disaster struck.

Osibissa played a team style of ball which could have favorably matched up with any team in the League. Despite the fact that Gillams gave an outstanding performance, many observers could attest that there was not a true superstar on the team. One can only attribute their performance to the magnificent job done by each of the players.

We are compelled to honor Osibissa, who when looking about them saw those who strive for private self seeking, sacrificed themselves rather than yield integrity of conscience and inner conviction to the behest of a tyrant. Osibissa are truly champions.

The individual in sports

By E. PATRICK MCQUAID

On any given day you might enter the Boyden Gym and see Dave Dunningham tumbling across the mats. Down one flight you may find Gordon Royal stretching his limbs trying to throw his opponent, or perhaps Mike Barker attempting to pin his partner down. And in the lower level you'll probably catch Peg Koumjian in a fast game of squash, if your eyes are quick enough.

If you do stop by you'll notice one thing for sure: they are alone. They do not wear the UMass Gymnastics uniform or the Wrestling team apparel; they are individuals working out on their own.

Training on an individual basis rather than with the team can have its advantages.

"I work at my own pace," says Dave Cunningham, a junior Engineering major. Dave and two of his friends usually practice gymnastics on Tuesday and Thursday nights. His attention turned to athletics last year when he accompanied a member of the Men's Gym team to a practice drill one evening.

Dave personally prefers the hanging rings over other athletic apparatus found at Boyden. After a year of practice he is quite proficient in his performance.

"At first I felt stupid," he said. "It all looked so easy but it's pretty hard when you're up there in the beginning."

For this very reason many people will not give it a try. Others feel that they will hurt themselves.

"People think they're gonna get killed and they won't try it," says Mike Barker, a sophomore who's gotten involved with wrestling.

Mike was first attracted to wrestling when it was included in his high school gymnastics course. Last year, an ad in the Collegian prompted him to join in the UMass intramural contentions.

Intramural wrestling is neither a team nor a class. It accepts anyone and everyone and you work at your own pace. Three "clinics" are offered prior to the scheduling of competitions and all interested are catagorized in divisions according to their weight. Starting at 127 lbs. and working up to 197 lbs., groups range in units of 10 lbs.

Sixteen people started in Mike's division (147 lbs.). Working out as often as possible he made the top four semi-finalists and placed third in his set.

Mike didn't enter wrestling as a winner; he took defeat with victory. Unlike a team sport, in individual wrestling you can personally learn from your opponent and a loss is not as heart breaking as when the football or basketball team forfeits a game.

"When you do things," says Mike Barker, "you try to do your best; win or lose." This philosophy in sports has encouraged him to work harder in his studies. "It's not an escape from school," he continued, "it goes hand in hand."

Unfortunately, wrestling has a negative appeal to many people. As with gymnastics, fear of failure or harm is prevalent.

"I mean, I'm not just a jock freak," concluded Mike, "It's fun to get out there and compete!"

"It's much more than just a martial art," says Gordon Royal speaking on Karate. "It's a philosophy, a way of life."

Gordon first took interest in self defense while in High School he took courses in both Karate and Judo at a local institute in Boston. Since then he has been practicing on his own and has found an interest in Akido, a non-violent means of defense.

"A lot of places teach the fighting aspect of Karate, they don't emphasize the spiritual benefits of it," he continued. "Karate is for your body and your mind. It encompasses the entire person that you are and be."

On the not too popular sport of Squash, Peg Koumjian said "It's great exercise. It's a sport that you can pick up pretty easy and have a lot of fun with."

Peg and her friend Alicia Dirol started playing Squash about a month ago. They go down to the courts at Boyden about three times a week and workout together.

They have both found that exercising like this has improved their work in school. "You feel so much better physically that you can't help but do better in class. Your mind is at ease, you sleep and study better."

Working on their own, these people have confronted their potential and gone beyond. The human body is limitless; it can harness energy and power to perform feats beyond the imagination.

The Individual: within, above, and beyond.

Skok clobbered, Red Sox Tigered 6-3

LAKELAND, Fla. (AP) — Juan Marichal pitched five scoreless innings in his second exhibition appearance, but Craig Skek was clobbered Wednesday as the Boston Red Sox dropped a 6-3 decision to the Detroit Tigers before 3,067 fans.

Marichal, a 35-year-old right-hander purchased from San Francisco last December after winning 238 games for the Giants, allowed five hits, walked two and struck out four.

He was at his best in the second inning when the Tigers loaded the bases with one out. Bearing down, Marichal struck out Gerry Moses and got John Knox to ground to the first baseman.

However, Skok, a southpaw struggling uphill to retain a job in Boston, showed little after taking over from Marichal.

The loss left the Red Sox with a 10-4 record, while the Tigers moved up to .500 with a 7-7 mark.

Rambling thoughts

Some rambling thoughts before vacation. While I think Ned Martin is the best Red Sox' broadcaster because of his objectivity, I hope that during games aired on the radio he doesn't get into his spring training tirades about surfing on Lake Lulu, the beautiful orange groves in Winter Haven, or the annual battle for the Polk County Championship. I am one student who won't be enjoying the sun and fun of beautiful Florida.

Another event coming up in the near future is the yearly draft of the National Basketball Association. While enjoying the fun and no sun of New York at the NIT this past weekend, I and several other UMies saw a team that beat the Minutemen which will have two of their starters go in the first four rounds of the draft. I'm speaking of Jacksonville's Butch Taylor and Leon Benbow. While this year's senior crop of stars doesn't amount to much as a whole - name the remaining players who will go in round one after Bill Walton, Marvin Barnes, Keith Wilkes, Kevin Stacom, and Lloyd Batts - Taylor and Benbow could come out of the whole lottery smelling like roses with lucrative no-cut contracts. I wish the both of them luck with the hope that they don't become "pampered" like so many pros in a number of sports in the past.

An example of the pampered player, constantly complaining, was Billy Conigliaro while he was performing in Boston and Milwaukee. Here's the way someone becomes a pampered athlete. One of the basic prerequisites is always to complain about nagging injuries which really don't amount to much - never to "play in pain." Always an excuse. "Well coach, last week my kidneys were bothering me and I was slower than Orlando Cepeda going down to first base. The trainer gave me some pills to help clear up the problem, but the pills didn't work and now my bladder is killing me. Injuries are in my contract, Coach. I probably won't live long enough to become a five-year man and be eligible to collect a pension. You're supposed to feel sorry for me, Coach. If it weren't for my athletic ability, I wouldn't be able to hold a job anywhere. I'm the type who would be laid off every two weeks and would have to live off everyone else's money, and besides, my horoscope says I shouldn't play this weekend."

Some people are exactly like that. This year's senior class graduating into the pros should be aware of these things in order to ignore them. They should choose a good agent like Bob Woolf. He's seen a few pampered athletes in his time.

Some final rambling thoughts on the NIT. It appears as though the Minutemen were defeated by the eventual winner in the first round again. In New York it's the week of the Dolphins. And I also hope BC shows those Huskies down at UConn how to play basketball. Mark Raterink should do it to them just as he did it to us up at Chestnut Hill. He might have been the difference between NIT and NCAA for the Minutemen. I also was glad Hawaii beat Fairfield by a single point simply because Fairfield was using all our cheers and songs. That's plagiarism. May the man in the Tidy Bowl cause flooding on their official NIT tee-shirts. Besides Hawaii flew a long way and Fairfield dribbled a mere 75 miles. (around the corner for our dribblers) And the Alohas put on quite a halftime show.

Fun city was fun while it lasted.

Pesky speaks out

The "new-look" Red Sox are tearing up the Grapefruit League, leaving fear and destruction in the wake of their trail of victories. Will Our Heroes lose a game this season?

The answer begins to unfold in Milwaukee on April 5. If you tune in to that opening telecast, this is probably what you'll hear:

"Good afternoon, everyone, from County Stadium in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, it's Red Sox Baseball. I'm Ken Coleman, with me is Johnny Pesky, and we'll be bringing you all the exciting action. John what can you tell us about the Sox' new manager, Darrel Johnson."

"He's a fine young man, Ken, and the guys on the team think he's just a keen guy. Just the other day one of the rookies' wives was having a baby and he let him out of sliding practice to call the hospital."

"Realistically speaking, John,how would you appraise the Sox' chances for the season?"

"Kenny, there's no question in my mind that we've got a championship club here in Boston. All the boys want to win it for Mr. Yawkey, and no one deserves it more than him. And, you know, but the thing that impresses me most about this year's team is the attitude.

You know, they're just a bunch of fine young men, and I don't think you'll find a finer, and younger bunch around."

"John, you mentioned the reat attitude these guys have, in what ways have you noticed it?"

"Well, just take a look at that Orlando Cepeda. He might be on pension from the Giants, but he's not taking it easy. He's always trying to keep himself in shape. Why, just yesterday I saw him sitting in front of his locker after everyone had gone and he was varnishing one of his legs."

"As you know John, Darrell Johnson is expecting the team's veterans to set an example for the many young players. As you mention, Cepeda's a good one. How are the other veterans doing?"

"Ken, they're all great, no matter how good they are. Yaz is hustling just like he did when he first came up and he's always trying to improve himself. He was talking with Rico about bunting the other day and I heard him say 'After practice I think I'll go put a few down.' He never stops, never lets up."

"What about the pitching staff, John?"

"They're all fine young men, Ken with reat arms. I'm impressed with young Marichal, well he isn't that young, but he's pitching like it. He's lost a little of his smoke, but that screwball is untouchable. But the kid I like most is the funny-looking kid with the weird motion. His arm never gets tired. Why, I've seen him pitch five, six hours straight. I don't know his full name, but the players call him "Iron Mike."

"I see the season's just about ready to start, John, one final question; what do you think about baseballs now being made out of cowhide."

"Ken, I have nothing against all those fine young cows, but I don't like it. I'll have to find a new bunch of cliches."

Baseball team: tough road

By MIKE BROPHY

The 1973 campaign marked the fourth time in the history of UMass baseball that the squad compiled a record of 20 or more wins. They finished at 21-9-1 and were rated among the Top Twenty in the nation.

Coach Dick Bergquist will have his work cut out for him as he has lost ten lettermen from last year's Yankee Conference Champions, five of them underclassmen with elegibility left.

The Munitemen will, indeed, be hard pressed to repeat the feats of 1973, but are still looking for that first stop on the way...the YanCon crown.

With pitchers John Olson and Craig Allegrezza, both big righties, back in shape and Chip Baye also ready to go in fine form, the pitching staff appears ready to answer the challenge of 74.

Last season's pitching staff had the luxury of the services of sophomore Mike Flanagan who has since signed with the Baltimore Orioles. Undefeated in two years of regular season pitching, Flanagan was beaten in the New England Playoffs at Fenway Park by Harvard, 4-2.

He led the staff with 91 strike outs and will be sorely missed.

Freshmen Jerry Erb and John Reardon of Dalton will figure highly in the picture this season, also, as they will round out the staff with sophomore John McManus and junior Bill Cullity.

"If they can do the job then we'll be in fine shape," commented Bergquist. "We will miss that .300 hitting punch this Spring and I think we'll need all the pitching help we can get if we're to repeat as champs," he added.

The catching should be a positive spot on the squad this year with the return of John Healy who could develop into one of the best defensive catchers every to pass through UMass. Last season he batted .239 and stole six bases on seven attempts, an asset Bergquist could call upon more frequently this spring.

Three sophs will be pushing Healy for his job as Jim Black, Neal Desmarais, and Bob Moore have come on strong.

Defense and execution of sound offensive fundamentals are Bergquist's prime hopes for a good season as he will relay on the hit-and-run more often as well as utlilizing bunt situations to move men into scoring position.

Mike Koperniak has been moved from the second base to short stop to fill the gap left by Eddie McMahon (now with the Tacoma farm team of the Minnesota Twins). "He has great hands and used to play short in high school (Adams High) before coming here," said Bergquist. Koperniak could be one of the stronger batsmen this season as he is coming off a season in which he batted .345 while hitting two home runs, four doubles, and a triple.

The battle for second is on between Joe Marzilli and Billy MacDonald, both up from last season's JV squad. "They are just about dead even at this point," said Bergquist," but his is why we go South-to iron out the wrinkles."

Pete Backstrom is the only returning veteran in the outfield but will be joined by experienced men from last season's JV team in Mark Fontaine and Gary Sanderson. Mike Joyce will also see some action in the outfield during the season, too, Bergquist noted.

"Rick Hansen, at this point anyway," said Bergquist, "appears to be the best choice for the DH spot but that can change as the season progresses."

The team heads South at 1 a.m. Friday for an eight game road trip and will then return home for a 22 game season in the New England circles, always looking ahead to Omaha.

Severi's third and final segment on UMass sports history appears Friday.

Fillies, Shaka IM hoop kings

By RUSS SMITH

It's all over! The Intramural Basketball Championships has been decided!

The Fillies from Melville are the women champs via their 22-11 win over Field Gold, who are now second on campus. This is the second year the Fillies have played together. This also, marks the third year in a row, a team from Melville has won the Championship. According to the coach of the Fillies, they didn't go into the game over-confident. "We knew it was going to take a superb team effort to win" she commented. And I guess that's just what they got.

In a consolation game to decide Campus Third, Dupas squeaked past Sigma Kappa 15-13.

Now, for the men: This was a fantastic ballgame. Everyone involved should get a trophy. The intramural office had the bleachers put around court two, in preparation for a big turnout. As it was, about 125 people, mostly students, watched this matchup of the two best teams on campus: The Pacemakers and Shaka. The i.m. office even had official scorekeepers. Even the refs, Paul Berard and John Pension, should get one, for their professional officiating.

In fact, the only thing this game didn't have was an overtime.

Here's THE game: Both teams started off defensive and offensive-minded. Both passed the ball well, and set up for the good shot. With the score at 9-8, Shaka ahead, both teams started committing fouls, which should've changed the game around to one team taking over the show. But, no go, and at the half, Shaka had a slim five point lead, 23-18.

After the two-minute break, it was back to the action once again. The Pacemakers won the jump and scored fast. Suddenly, the momentum had changed hands, as the Pacemakers forced Shaka to take pressure shots, throw the ball away, and then foul in their frustration to get any points on the board. Before you knew it, it was 24-23, and the Pacemakers looked to be in command!

Timeout! Timeout, Shaka.

Whatever they discussed during that one-minute timeout should be implimented into all college coaches manuals, because it works! Shaka came out flying, and preceded to make the Pacemakers commit fouls, turnovers, and miss shots. All this lead to an 11-4 Shaka scoring binge, and a 34-28 lead. Then, it was the Pacemakers turn, and they outscored Shaka in the next 2½ minutes 6-2, and closed to within a hoop, 36-34.

Shaka bought the ball down with two minutes left to play. They shot, and missed..but the rebound scored..38-34. The Pacemakers threw a football pass down court, shot...and scored! 38-36, Shaka. And, Shaka called their last timeout. And again, their strategy worked, as they took their time, and made the shot count (and got a foul shot out of it too). They made it! 41-36!

The Pacemakers got the ball with four seconds left-which wasn't enough, and THE GAME was over. Shaka became the Campus Champ of Basketball for 1973-74.

Gorillas ready for spring offensive

By MIKE ELLIOTT

The UMass lacrosse team will open its 1974 season at Hofstra on Saturday, March 30. However, Garber's Gorillas, as they are more commonly known, will be missing John McCarthy, one of their top defensemen. McCarthy, a junior letterman from Mineola, New York, will undergo surgery for a knee injury incurred in a sledding accident. He will be out for the season.

The Gorillas will be playing in a new division this year. They have moved up from Division II to Division I. In Division I UMass will be in the company of such perennial powerhouseslacrosse as Maryland, Navy, and Johns Hopkins. The change in divisions hasn't affected this year's schedule but it will affect statistics, rankings, selections of All-American teams, and post-season tournaments.

The Gorillas, 1973 New England Champions, had a good fall season and thus far in spring scrimmages have looked excellent. They have beaten Army, Yale, and the Brine Lacrosse Club and next Saturday and Sunday will scrimmage Middlebury, and Central Connecticut before meeting Hofstra the following Saturday.

Head Coach Dick Garber is impressed with this year's team. Said Garber, "This year's team is definitely the best team I've ever coached. We have excellent depth at all positions. We have a very strong and experienced club with John Rutledge in goal; Billy Blaustein, Rich Lally, and Russ Incorvia on defense; Hirsch Seidman, Gene Hardiman, and Jack Moran at midfield; and Frank Garahan, Harry McVey, and Jeff Spooner at attack."

This year's team has eighteen lettermen returning.

UMass will play a fourteen game schedule this spring with only six home games. They will play some top teams, including seventh-ranked Hofstra, Brown, and Cortland State, the 1973 Division II national champions.

Ralph Nader and People in ballroom Monday. Waking you up and making you MOVE is his aim, and maybe someday...

Power Pollutes ,thus —

The People's Galvanizer

by David Sokol and John Dean

The head salesman walked self-confidently into the room and from the assembled crowd could be heard sounds of favorable reaction. He stepped up to the podium and elicited an even larger response from the eager listeners as he began his little talk. Ralph Nader had come to Amherst not to sell a new product which would eliminate baldness or make fingernails longer, but rather to sell an idea, or more than that, a way of thinking. He came to Amherst to make a reply to the large oil companies and the United States government, and to convince his audience that they too were involved and so must become actively involved. There was no soft sell in his approach, no avoidance of the issues, no vacillation, and no reticence. He, unlike others who proclaim to be looking out for the welfare of "the people", seemed to be sincere. He threw no curves and backed up his words with facts. He was not out to win over any voters, or to be catagorized and pigeonholed into a nice clean slot in the wall. In essence, he was not and did not convey the air of being a politico.

Perhaps the worst thing one can say about Ralph Nader is that he is a fanatic, a man with a message which dominates his whole life. He characterized himself as standing for "justice and decency", and these words may best describe his motives and motivation. Ralph Nader, the small man who took on the large auto makers in the sixties, has now risen to legendary dimensions. He has said it all before, in many places, over many forms of media, and many of the people had heard what he had to say at least once, yet they still silently smiled to themselves as he mentioned 'monopoly', and were eager to hear the next syllable as it flowed out of his mouth.

He not only offered a host of problems, but actually supplied some manner of self-participation which could be undertaken by anyone sitting in the audience. Above all, he provides an example of how one can seek to change constructively, and he offers a vehicle through which other people can effect change. In this way, he is a positive force in a world filled with a lack of answers.

He challenged the validity of an energy crisis at this moment, but warned in the next breath that America had better get off its "energy binge" and adopt some sort of energy policy now. The energy crisis may be contrived today, and we should realize that we do have an abundance of coal and oil at present, but we should also recognize that we shouldn't waste these valuable resources and that we should start developing alternatives now.

It's no longer news that the American people have been misled and lied to about the existing energy resources and future energy producing sources. What is news is that the people are finally, though slowly, becoming aware and learning at least some variation on the Government's facts.

The Orchard Hill 'Great Decisions' series recently concerned itself with the "Energy Crisis", and one point was made abundantly clear. Man's technological and, perhaps even one-time good intentions in the name of progress, have failed. In attempting to harness and maximize the capacity of the atom (through fission), he has created a Frankensteinian monster, more than capable of destroying us all, many times over, in fact. Still, it seems that the major world powers have set their sights on nuclear power, and even with all its dangers, are proceeding in the construction of nuclear power plants (nukes), both in this country and in the U.S.S.R. David Ingles of the University of Massachusetts Physics Department discussed the advantage and disadvantages of nuclear energy. The one advantage is that nuclear fuel is compact. A handful of uranium has the same potential as many trainloads of coal. But that's it. The dangers are immense.

In addition to the ever-present (meaning from now until eternity, literally) possibilities of radioactive leakage, both Professor Ingles and Ralph Nader stress the dangers surrounding the vulnerability of the existing and proposed plants. Perhaps if nuclear power were the only alternative, and the plants were constructed underground, there would at least be the elements of necessity, inaccessibility, and increased safety. Yet, above-ground (and the plants will all be above-ground), nuclear power plants are the possible targets for terrorists and saboteurs, with literally thousands and thousands of people as potential hostages. Ingles made it clear that "each reactor will be producing the stuff which bombs are made of", and it would be easier to "hijack" one of these plants than an aircraft. Nuclear power pollutes.

But ironically, the factor which will ultimately prevent the nukes from achieving the now-predicted widespread use won't be the deadly dangers, or the public hazards, or man's realization of his blunder. It will be money. Originally the estimated cost of the installation of 1 kilowatt with nuclear power ran somewhere between $184 and $190. Now, the projected costs for the 1980's are somewhere between $750 to $900 per kilowatt. Money (or lack thereof) which has created so many artificial barriers and injustices in the past, will ultimately save us. And the cheapest, least polluting, and safest alternative, solar power will eventually become the rule rather than the exception. But 'eventually' is the key word here, as it is going to be a long time before existing plans and the status quo get reversed. The Ingles, the Naders, the Heronemuses, and even the Udalls are only the beginning. Local groups like the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group are only the start.

As the American people wake up to the ultimate dangers of nuclear power, they will also begin to see the corrupt workings of the major oil companies, Exxon, Texaco, Shell, Mobil, Gulf, Standard Oil of California, and British Petroleum, collectively referred to by Nader as the "Seven Sisters". This oligopoly controls the pipelines, the refineries, and the distribution systems, pays virtually no taxes, and works together in "joint ventures". The Federal Energy Office in Washington (Nader calls it the "office which is Simonizing America these days") has no outlets for the representation of labor and small business. But more important is the fact that consumer interests are not represented. When questioned about this, Simon does not reply.

So what does this all mean with regards to a future energy policy? Nader outlines the key points as the conservation of energy and the need for an alternative to nuclear power. But Nader also debunks the myth (spelled propaganda) of the absolute energy shortage by insisting that America is "on an energy binge" with lifestyles which are "tailor-made to waste energy". Nader cites the analogy of a man, who upon after eating four turkeys on Thanksgiving, finds out that a fifth is unavailable, and cries out "food shortage" as being comparable to our wasting the abundant resources and crying "fuel shortage". The solutions, the alternatives are all here, but we've got to adapt to prove equal to the imminent task.

The Truth Never Lies —(more P & B)

by David Miller and Andrew MacKenzie

B.T.S.: You've talked about 're-investigating' some of your old works . . .

Berg.: We're always doing that, contemporizing the characters, because those characters are real; they speak through us. That's the power of the Firesign. Characters speak through the Firesign. So those people are alive; Ralph Spoilsport is not frozen in history — He's available at any time, as long as there's a car salesman left in this country, Ralph lives. I mean, he can sell marijuana, he can sell cars, he can sell homes, he can sell trips to the moon; as long as he's there, he's good. Porgey's good, as long as there's kids, as long as kids are treated like Porgey's treated, or Mudhead . . . those characters are real. As long as there's a church of the Presuptuous Consumption, there's got to be a Pastor Flash. And Pastor Flash can come on five records from now and sell you the smallest white suede-covered bibles in the world — He's still there.

(At this point, the tape is turned over. The first sound recorded on side two is Proctor imitating a tape being played backwards, followed by Bergman: "It's all right, they're speaking Chinese.")

Berg.: Proctor and Bergman have a new album coming out: What this Country Needs. It won't be out until September. Firesign is working on the concept of another album, working on a full show, working on a feature movie . . .

Proc.: And we just finished a new book, The Firesign Theater's Big Mystery Joke Book, in which will be the scripts of Nick Danger, Giant Rat of Sumatra, a lot of other pieces that have never been seen before.

Berg.: Some you've heard, like on Dear Friends — "$100.00 Ben" is in it. Then there's a piece that you've never heard, which is Phil Austin's "Dream Play", which we ought to perform on record sometime . .

Proc.: And there's a version of "Gramp's World", which was never seen. In fact, "Gramp's World" didn't even get on Dear Friends. But it's coming on What this Country Needs. And The Big Mystery Joke Book is illustrated in a slightly different way, as well, from The Big Book of Plays. The illustrations for "Nick Danger" are pictures that we took at the time to illustrate "Nick Danger," in the style of a 1930's radio magazine, and the pictures for Giant Rat are a special session of pictures that we took that are all of us in costumes and characters illustrating various aspects of the story; it's very funny, and the other illustrations are drawn from our great Library of Forbidden Photographs, the Zeta Collection, that illustrate each story with one picture or drawing or sketch, Berg.: Forbidden Photos — Some of them were never taken . . .

Proc.: Photos of the Forbidden City — "Oh, I'm sorry, you can't take that" — It's all these pictures of hands covering lenses, and the president with his hands up over his face . . .

So we're working on The Giant Rat of Sumatra as a screen property, we're working on Waiting for the Electrician or Someone Like Him as a screen property, we're working on Anytown, U.S.A., which will be our tour, as a TV tape property . . .

Berg.: We're going to publish with Samuel French — acting editions.

— 00000 —

(Here we discuss for a while the form of the acting editions; whether or not they would have specific stage directions or not, character descriptions, etc., then the talk turns to the posibility of staging Bozos:)

— 00000 —

Proc.: When we adopt Bozos into the tour show — we haven't staged it yet, so it'll probably undergo some more metamorphises, we conceive of it in three . . . There are four of us, right, so Clem is not Clem-Clone, he simply is Clem in this version, confronting the machine. The machine is visualized as a doctor's office, with two attendants — two male nurses — and the Doctor. The two male attendants become the Yes-No functions and Doctor Memory becomes the Readout, since he's a Direct Readout; that's what it means: D.R.; Dr. Memory. So he contains the information — The Yes-No functions, which is the binary function of any computer system, is that which releases or does not release material. So there were three 'Mac' functions' — machine functions — the internal affirmative, the internal negative, and the external negative, which also represent levels of memory. There are three levels of memory, according to the latest studies. There's the superficial memory, which in time is destroyed by use of . . . uh . . . those . . . uh . . . those . . uh, drugs. And then there's the subconcious memory, and then there's the Mammalary gland, which is of course . . .

Berg.: What makes you mammals.

Proc.: . . . that which most men in this society worship, if you could only remember when you last saw a pair. So anyway, there is one solution, there is one visualization of that function, and that seems to work handily for us. And what we're playing with now is the functions of the two 'Macs' on the side, and the function of Dr. Memory, and how the three of them confuse or don't confuse one another, and how they interact. When we get into clone what we're taling about is 'Mirror-image' — There's no clone in this play — it's too confusing.

Berg.: We're just adapting it to make it more publicly understandable because when you do a theater-piece you can't expect that they've got nine albums and they're going to come in and repeat it with you — We want to do a play that a new-comer to the Firesign Theater would understand.

Next week: more.

New Directions for Student Affairs

With an unprecedented burst of energy and excitement, over 140 Student Development Professionals and paraprofessionals participated in a two week workshop exploring new directions for student affairs on the Amherst campus of the University of Massachusetts.

The workshop brought together, from all parts of the campus, from all levels of service, people interested in working together to make the University a better place for themselves, for other staff members and for other students. It brought together people who had never before worked together, people traditionally separated by the boundries of area, agency, culture and profession.

It was this "mixture of people," combined with a very fortunate blend of speakers, presentations, small group discussions, mini-workshops, task groups, films and social moments that resulted in an extraordinary amount of excitement and effort.

The first week consisted of a series of formal and theoretical presentations by the students and staff of the university as well as faculty from other schools. The second week was filled with task groups and Issue workshops in the morning and modules in the afternoon.

The task groups were formed around 3 different concerns that had been identified over the course of the Network's first semester. The first group began an exploration of the Community Mental Health Model as applied to student affairs. The second group focused on the Resident Directors' role definitions, and the last group addressed the issue of academic programming in residential areas.

What became very clear on the fourth morning was the relevance and applicability of the ideas presented in the first week. The learning was real, the excitement was high, and the work will continue. The task groups begun during that workshop have continued into this second semester. The work of each group will be supported by the Network and communicated to the other campus groups at regular Network meetings and thru the distributed minutes. This continuation of the work begun during the workshop is perhaps the most significant feature of its success; it is certainly, according to the staff, the most rewarding.

For those participants choosing not to work in one of the task groups, three different issue workshops were offered. For many of the participants, according to the written evaluations, these mornings, one on racism, one on sexism and the third on drugs, were the most meaningful of the entire 2 weeks.

Sponsored by the Resource Network, a primarily volunteer organization founded by a grant from HEW's office of Drug Education, the workshop was designed, presented and staffed by an unusually diverse group of students and Student Development Personnel. Their generous donation of time and resources to this project stemmed from their commitment to the Network and its goal of increased collaboration.

The workshop was a result of their effort in direct response to the needs they had assessed. A questionnaire asking staff what they would like to have covered in the projected workshop, constant consultation with various groups on campus, and numerous checks with the total Network popuiation resulted in a program that organically reflected the needs and skills of its participants. The emphasis was on reciprocal learning rather than on "teaching down" to the "pupil". Participants shared with each other, their knowledge, experiences, resources and skills.

Although the workshop is now but a faint memory in the aftermath of a new semester's opening, both the process and the product continue.

The Resource Network, with its growing membership from all parts of the campus, meets twice a month (Wed. 12-2 p.m. C.C.) to continue its slow and difficult task: that of focusing student development towards a greater collaborative effort.

For more information about the workshop or the Resource Network itself, please stop into the office at 224 Berkshire or call any member of the Network Staff (Judy Davis, John Ferrie, Ron LaFrance), at 545-0851.

Lucy Benson: A Woman in Politics

by Mark Vogler

Lucy Wilson Benson gave up a classroom career; but found satisfaction "teaching" a national organization of 160,000 women.

Twenty-four years ago as the young wife of an Amherst College professor, she set aside plans to earn a PhD in History and joined the Amherst League of Women Voters.

Today Mrs. Benson is national president of the League — and is considered in the minds of many "the most influential woman" to hit the Massachusetts political scene.

In May she will step down from the presidency which she has occupied for the past six years.

"I joined the league out of self defense"

"If anybody told me 15 years ago that I would become President of the League of Women Voters of the United States, I probably would have been angry and totally unbelieving," Mrs. Benson said in a recent interview.

"But now that I've done it, I'm glad. I've gotten to know countless politicians from both parties who I have a great deal of empathy and sympathy for."

Mrs. Benson considers the task of a politician "the hardest job in the world."

"Nobody else is being held up to constant public scrutiny. While people think the politician should be 'Simon pure' in honesty and fairness, they frequently ask politicians to do things which are neither 'Simon pure' or fair," she said.

"I like politicians, though. Even when I don't agree with them, I find them an interesting species."

It was her acute interest in politics which probably lured Mrs. Benson away from her scholarly work and a teaching career.

After earning B.A. and M.A. degrees in history from Smith College, "I joined the League out of a self defense," she said.

"I didn't really get involved for several years ... I was about to go in and get the PhD, but one thing led to another and here I am."

Seven years after Mrs. Benson joined the Amherst League, she was elected as its president. Four years later, in 1961, she assumed the leadership of the Massachusetts League.

Her impact on the state league was to practically reverse its image of "little 'ole ladies in tennis shoes" to what the Boston Globe described as "a force for good with which to reckon."

After a successful referendum drive to remove excessive powers held by the Governor's Council and to effect other changes in the executive branch, the Globe wrote of the League's president, "She has dared to lead the League's members far deeper into the thicket of politics than ever before."

Those who were members of the Massachusetts League at that time, gained an education on "how to become successful," as taught by Professor Benson.

"...The reality of money. It's got to be had, it's got to be raised. It costs money to get pieces of paper into the people's hands," she says.

"I like politicians, though. I find them an interesting species."

"You can't run the League and you can't be politically effective without it. Money is incidental. Not being able to do something that needs to be done because you don't have the money seems to be a poor excuse."

During her tenure as the National League's president, Mrs. Benson has persuaded members that the organization "always needs more money," and she went about developing methods of raising that money.

"Women who don't work tend to feel they don't have any money because they didn't earn it ... this is silly."

Because of Mrs. Benson's initiative to go out and raise funds herself and encourage other members to follow suit, the League is able to study more issues thoroughly.

But, money — as Mrs. Benson suggests — is incidental.

"One of my biggest accomplishments has been getting the League to actively attack issues on the political scene instead of just studying them and dropping them.

"There's a big difference between testifying in Congress — and lobbying. We have established a strong lobbying corp of volunteers."

The impeachment question is one of the major issues being reviewed by the League right now, according to Mrs. Benson.

"We've taken no stance on the President's guilt or innocence. The League never takes a stand on personality issues. But it is our view that carrying out the impeachment inquiry is the only way to find out who is responsible for what."

"We think that the hearings should be open, the House Judiciary Committee must have full access to all sorts of information, and there must be a very strict definition of what national security means so it can't be used as a blanket to hide under.

"We want to be sure that the procedure is open, responsible and fair. People shouldn't be afraid of it. It was provided for in the Constitution."

The League has subjected campaign finance reform to rigorous scrutiny, Mrs. Benson said.

"Although there is an obvious need for reform in putting limitations on private contributors, we don't think it is a good idea to rely totally on public financing.

"The more people who can participate in the process, the better."

Other issues which Mrs. Benson and the League are attacking include environment vs. the energy crisis, Government contribution to building of sewage treatment plants, a "bloody battle" over welfare reform, Congressional reform, international trade, equal rights, the budget, civil rights and powers and D.C. Home Rule.

On many of these issues, the League and Mrs. Benson have not been satisfied with the outcome.

"It has been very difficult to have been president of the League at a time when the President of the country and the members of the League of Women Voters have agreed on so few things," she says.

"In the primary areas where we've been working — the environment and human resources — we and the president don't seem to agree."

"There has certainly been a lack of concern by this administration for the consumer. Even though many don't agree with Mr. Nixon on many different issues, I thought he could or would cope with our economic problems.

"I'm very dismayed that while carrying off these great coups with China and Russia that he would allow our economic and political relationships with Japan and Western Europe to get into such bad shape."

Mrs. Benson is "personally disappointed" that the League of Women Voters did not make the administration's infamous "Enemy List."

"I'm convinced that they never thought of mentioning us because we're a women's organization ... I'd rather have the flak than not have it. To be ignored is worse than anything," she said.

"Men aren't anti-women, but they just don't think of us sometimes. Without exception, men always turn to me and ask me to recommend some women. It's not their fault. It's the fault of society."

But while Mrs. Benson feels that the League has often been ignored due to its female composition, she admits that Women's Liberation has been quick to criticize it.

"The League has never been a Women's Lib organization, in some ways almost anti-feminist. It's been slow to get involved in the Women's Movement.

"Though a Women's organization, we're a citizen's organization with issues normally identified as citizen issues."

In time, the League will open its membership to men, she added.

Taken lightly by men because they were women ... criticized by the Women's Movement for being "anti-feminist" ... How did Mrs. Benson attain success with the League?

"We used no single approach. We had to tailor our approach. At first we knew the League wasn't the most welcomed of groups. So we listened and didn't ask questions and didn't argue. We tried to be noticed, but not much.

"I was always fascinated with politics . . ."

"Once we had been around for a while, people got to notice us, but not as little 'ole ladies in tennis shoes.

"Our approach generally is a mixture of tact, diplomacy and humor — a vital necessity."

Mrs. Benson's work week — volunteer — resembles that of Secretary of State Henry Kissinger who is always "on the go."

On the average, she spends three days and two nights out of the week at her national office in Washington, D.C. reading various committee reports, reviewing important correspondence, making administrative decisions on League policy, raising funds and meeting with Congressional figures on Capitol Hill.

"It's hectic. Monday and Tuesday, I'm hell-bent to get to the office. Then when I get there, I'm hell-bent to get home. Washington is the meetingest place I know: I'm constantly in meetings down there."

When Mrs. Benson returns to her husband Bruce, who is a Physics professor at Amherst College, vast paperwork also awaits her at home. But, on May 10, her fast-paced life will slow down.

On that day, the League will accept its ninth president.

"I told the nominating committee two years ago that I would not be considered again for a fourth term. I've been president for six years — a long time — time to do something else," she says.

Would that something else be teaching?

"I really don't have an urge to teach. I was always fascinated with politics..."

Politics? Would Lucy Benson still consider a political career?

"Oh, sure. I've thought of running. But I'd have to have an office to run for."

And if Rep. Silvio O. Conte were to run for the Senate someday...

"I'd run in a minute! But I don't expect Mr. Conte to leave to run for another office. We're old friends and he's a very good congressman.

"In order to run for office, I'd have to be totally stupid or have something to run for or run against. I wouldn't like to run for the sake of running.

"But there's enough to do right now. I wouldn't mind a little slowdown in the pace. If I become too frustrated, I'll move to East Africa and spend my time watching lions ... I love animals."

The Beauty Of John Coltrane

by Ken Blanchard

Concert in Japan
John Coltrane Quintet
(ABC- Impulse As-9246-2)

It has been said (most likely in reference to the works of John Coltrane) that all music is communication, but of course not all communication is music. This music-communication dichotomy can be defended on either side when applied to Coltrane, because the things that he was exploring prior to his death in 1967 were so atypical of music — even revolutionary. This recording reflects the beauty of Coltrane.

This double-record set contains recordings of a concert given in Tokyo on July 22, 1966, and the material has never previously been released.

There are only three compositions included in this set, so there is ample opportunity to hear some very extended solo work by Coltrane on tenor saxophone, Pharoah Sanders on tenor sax and bass clarinet, Alice Coltrane on piano, and Rashied Ali on drums, Jimmy Garrison is bassist, but he doesn't take any solos.

The concert begins with "Meditations", a rambling exploration in sound that typifies later Coltrane compositions. But sound is the essence of music, and it must precede music . . . the "Meditations" are followed by "Leo" (Part One), where Pharoah Sanders whips out a 14-minute tenor sax solo (the average length of the solos on this recording). It's a thoughtful solo, but his bass clarinet solo after the drum solo on "Leo" (Part Two) seemed relatively uninteresting.

Also on this cut is an extended piano solo by Alice Coltrane. Ms. Coltrane replaced McCoy Tyner in John Coltrane's group in 1966, and anyone who bemoaned the loss of Tyner hasn't heard this solo. Admittedly, she does borrow some things from Tyner, but her ideas and their execution more than makes up the difference.

In the liner notes, Alice said, "The music of this album is reminiscent of so much of the spiritual joy and peace we felt during our most memorable stay in Japan." I think that the joy and the peace she refers to is best expressed in a beautiful composition entitled "Peace On Earth".

On this piece Coltrane takes a formidable solo — so formidable that if it doesn't strike fear in the hearts of aspiring sax players, then those people just don't know the meaning of the word. The emotion is appropriate to the title of the song, for what else could or should inspire awe then the serenity of peace on earth?

Coltrane attempted to universalize music. It was as much communication and expression as it was mathematics, rhythms, harmonics, chromatics, overtones were utilized. He was among the first musicians who didn't try to stay in one key or play around chord changes — he explored new sounds, new techniques, and played his instrument compltely, using every register. This album captures some of the most interesting moments of Coltrane, and helps us to understand what he was about.

Gone But Not Missed

NINE — FAIRPORT CONVENTION (A&M SP 3603)
Total Playing Time: 38:05

Recorded by the same line-up as those who produced last year's disappointing Rosie. Fairport Nine is certainly a reassuring improvement though it's a shame that Fairport haven't chosen to go back to recording more traditional material. Easily their beat post — Sandy Denny album was Angel Delight which was pretty much divided between traditionals and originals. Nine features seven Fairport written tunes (though two borrow traditional lyrics), one traditional instrumental medley, and the Fairport arrangement of "The Hexhashire Lass". Noted British-folkologist Michael Bloom must have been knocked out the first time he heard the latter, the most inspired Fairport recording since "Angel Delight". Unfortunately, this being 1974 with the terribly inflated record prices and all, it is awfully hard to say the familiar "this song alone is worth the price of the album", but I'll succumb. "The Hexhashire Lass" alone is worth the price of Fairport Nine.

The original tunes reflect the ole English humor as well as a generally more complex texture. Guitarists Trevor Lucas and Jerry Donahue, both veterans of Ms. Denny's short-lived Fotheringay, get more heavily into the writing with Donahue's instrumental "Tokyo" and Lucas's "Bring 'em Down", both pluses. The Swarbrick-Lucas "Pleasure and Pain" described as "Irish country and western" is an interesting diversion for the F'ports.

Featuring most of the positive aspects which have made the all male Fairports so good. Nine is a definite success which helps to dispell much of the anguish which accompanied Rosie. A new Steeleye Span album with drummer is imminent so that between the Ports and the Span, English folies will be rocking with happy ears.

TABERNAKEL-JAN AKKERMAN
(Atco) — Time 36:49

After listening to this album, I have come to the conclusion that Jan Akkerman has to be one of the finest musicians to hit these shores in a long time. He ranks right up there with Jeff Beck, Duane Allman and Steve Howe (Yes) in my guitar book. He has more than proven his abilities on electric guitar with Focus. Now on Tabernakel, Akkerman swerves his attention to showing off on that magical instrument called the lute. About 90 percent of the material on this disc is adaptations by Jan and friend George Flynn of older folk songs using the lute in place of the acoustic guitar.

Side One is made up of short compositions, all less than four minutes in length. Only "House of the King" and "Javeh" are Akkerman-penned tunes. "House of the King" has appeared before on Focus III. Done differently this time around, Jan replaces the flute melody line with his guitar (What Thijs Van Leer can do on flute, Jan Akkerman can do on guitar!). Other material on this side is very delightful, especially "Britannia". Jan's lute work is nothing short of spectacolor. Tasteful orchestration doesn't mess them up either.

Side Two is dominated by the fourteen minute "Lammy". This is an excellent piece highlighting intricate lute, acoustic and electric guitar work, and its fusion with some celestial organ-chorus and orchestra. The lesser two thirds of Beck, Bogert & Appice lend a helping hand on this number also.

Be forewarned, this album is not like any Focus album. It's a somewhat radical departure from electric heavyness, showcasing Jan's seemingly endless talent. (A+)

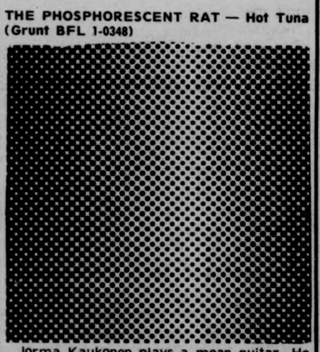
THE PHOSPHORESCENT RAT — Hot Tuna
(Grunt BFL 1-0348)



Jorma Kaukonen plays a mean guitar. He writes great melodies. Jorma Kaukonen is essentually Hot Tuna. Unfortunately, he doesn't quit there. He writes the lyrics, he sings (?) his creations, and I think his uncle sells his records at the local A&P.

The Phosphorescent Rat is made up to appear as a 'creative' album (with lyrics like "if the world is an oyster in your stew — you know you got a hungry friend"), but comes out as the local band trying to make it big. I would swear I heard the melodies before, but I will not accuse Mr. Kaukonen of playing (no pun intended) cops and robbers.

Jack Casady, who handles bass, does real fine work with Jorma in several selections. But somehow when Kaukonen sings he reminds me that he is singing through his nose because his voice is about to break. The record jacket says that Sammy Piazza played percussion and I'm sure he did.

Best effort: "Soliloquy For 2".

WANTED DEAD OR ALIVE
DAVID BROMBERG
(Columbia KC 32717)

Intelligent white blues as pocketed by people like Bromberg and Ry Cooder have always been and always will be a special sort of problem and a certain wry, spry type of musical revival revision of old forms (old blues for the most part) that, by the very act of being sung by white, middle-class whites, are being transformed into something quite different than Robert Johnson and the other originators had in mind (and body).

I'm sure both Cooder and Bromberg have the blues, and feel the blues, but their approach to the music is a lot more studied and calculated than say, Dr. Ross or Howlin' Wolf. So we have an interesting new development in white blues done with loving care replete with changes and developments of busy, busy minds. Bromberg's heard "Statesboro Blues" sung a thousand different times, and he's got too much of a mind to sing it a way it's been done before, and thus the bizarre string of interjections and twisted phrasing in his version. Done well, this is fine. Bromberg hasn't really much of a voice, so his singing must be as new and nimble, otherwise it will drown an album as it did his first two.

Wanted Dead Or Alive strikes a nice balance between Bromberg's blues, country and rock, and deserves a listen. B+

VIVE LA TRANCE-AMON DUUL II (United Artists UA-LA198-F) time 43:36

Fritzing right along in this German rock blitz is Vive La Trance, an interesting (as usual) release from this powerful band. What the Duuls usually do is set up a fairly conventional and occasionally 'nice' melody, run it through a few times, then abandon it to the onslaught of Chris Karrer and John Weinzierl's quite demented and finely fierce electronic guitar capped by some haunting, scoring, plainly vocals that sound like Nico trying to invoke the cosmic being, which makes for a lot of excellent bizarro, gonzesque music, but Karrer and Weinzierl are only going to take this band so far unless one or both of them changes his name to either Jimi or Igor.

excellent bizarro,
gonzesque music

Of all the German bands to surface on record in this country, this is probably the first you rockers will be able to pick up on, and the first you free spirits will leave behind. With lots of well-spent time in between, of course. B

In Concert:
The Pointer Sisters
Orpheum Theatre, Boston
March 15, 1974

It was Anita, Ruth, and Bonnie Pointer, minus June, but as they so aptly described it, "better three than none."

The complex harmonies of these rangy, lanky, vocalists more than covered the absence of the fourth sister, who was laid low by illness.

The Sisters' entrance was preceded by the showing of some animated nonsense, which became somewhat comical thanks to the back-up nostalgia of the Mills Brothers, also depicted briefly on a creased, midget-sized screen. (They don't show movies at the Orpehum any more.) The cartoon turned into a picture of their new Blue Thumb release. That's A Plenty, paving the way for nostalgia, part II: three colourfully costumed women side-strutting onto the spacious stage, one by one.

The Pointer Sisters like to bend their voices and hold them there, allowing the back-up band to go into some varied riffs, but they never lose the tightness of their adjoining harmony parts.

A bass player, pianist, and drummer accompanied the Sisters, but the complexity of the studio jazz musicians was clearly lacking. "Little Pony", a Hendricks-Ross bee-bop number from the new disc, greatly missed Herbie Hancock's keyboard work, although Tom Salisbury did a more than adequate job.

The Sisters were excused from an unusually short concert (55 minutes, with no encore) by the excellence of their performance. Mixing various old medleys with various paced rearrangements, they inserted somewhere in between a country tune written by Anita and Bonnie, one that could have been better omitted.

The climax was a burning version of Willie Dixon's "Wang Dang Doodle," which led into a jam session with Hugh Masekela, the nine man opening act, that was a combination of Early African and reggae. The act 15 people perform on the stage at the same time excited the crowd, but the result unfortunately detracted from the sharpness of what had preceded.

The Pointer Sisters, once accused of having missed their niche in their musical selection, have utilized fine studio people on two impressive albums, and have proved their ability to carry the live show on their own without the big studio boys.

GOOD TIMES — ELVIS PRESLEY (RCA CPL1-0475)

Finally Elvis has come out with the record I've been waiting for. This album, with two exceptions, incorporates Elvis's unique style into newer songs. In the first two songs he uses the Gospelish style found on most of his latest recordings, and they really don't sound too impressive. In every other song you can hear little bits of the old Elvis, the El that endeared him to the hearts of the late night movie watchers, and all the others who screamed at his concerts. For all of you who loved Elvis' country rock numbers and his deep vocals on those sensitive songs, this is the album that you've been waiting for too. Good Times also includes "Good Time Charlie's Got the Blues", and Elvis adds something to it that nobody else can. His voice is just as good as ever.

"All I Wanted To Do Was Play"– Basie

by David Letters

Although The Count did not wear his Captain's hat, the trade mark of this living legend, there was no doubt who led the band with light piano riffs and happy smiles to the audience. This was not a concert where Basie took the lead of the night offering evidence of his brilliance. Basie did not shine as in the days of old — his only piano solo did not grace the audience until the last song of the evening — which was the only time the entire audience swayed back and forth, shoulders moving in unison with the music. For many, the appearance of Basie has been a long wait. Those familiar with the music of Basie were there to see the Count shine, to hear a man tickle the 88's in a style of his own. For those who wanted to fly on his syncopated rhythms and scat singing, the night was a let down. For those interested in experiencing a very tight jazz orchestra fly through complex arrangements featuring outstanding solos from the brass, reeds and crying bones, they were satisfied.

True, everyone was there to hear Basie. Basie played, but the hit of the evening was his orchestra.

Al Grey ripped more than once on his bone, laying out some riffs which only Dorsey could top.

He held his trombone and started to fly whenever the Master looked his way. His competition was fierce, as he had to match Jimmy Forset blow off 32nds on the tenor with a smooth calm style missing today in most jazz orchestras and certainly not in evidence in the current rock music which seems to monopolize the airways. If the term "Honey from the Horn" was not a copyright of Al Hirt, it would be applied to Forrest who received the greatest audience response with fast runs in the upper register, slowing down to those mellow tenor D flats only to fly back into a frenzy, getting more out of his horns with double and triple riffs — playing octave refrains with a speed and dexterity that one would have to be familiar with Charlie Parker to understand.

Jimmy Forset has a tenor riff which allowed for improvisation within improvisation. Alternating with registers and changing keys often, he flew off into solos with a calmness and confidence that had the audience wildly applauding after every solo.

Paul Cohen had the audience hushed with his horn when he soloed on "Poor Butterfly." Spacing his solo with ½ beat breaks within his high C sharps, he offered the audience and orchestra inspiration as he was certainly hot that night. When Cohen laid down his horn, the audience went crazy.

Beside Cohen and Forrest, Pete Minger blew a fine horn and Alto man, Curtis Peagler, continued to bring the audience up with quick solos and perfect harmony, playing along with smooth riffs only to break out with constant intensity with upper resister alto solos.

The trumpet section — four fine horns — played perfectly together, and all executed fine solos. Using mutes on some solos and frequently as a brass section, the trumpets cried and screamed upon direction of the Master Basie. They ripped, and ripped hard, though they never did top the three trombones as a section. The bonemen had control — control — control. When one attends a concert of a master they expect that control.

Jimmy Ricks, the Count's vocalist was not there due to illness and it didn't matter, as the night belonged to the instrumentalists.

The Count played wearing a conservative grey checked jacket, and the band wore solid grey orchestra jackets. The only ray of color was the red-orange-yellow — you name it — madras coat of Sonny Payne the drummer, the only member of the orchestra to add some flashy showmanship. Payne carried the beat well, and certainly offered us a lesson in jazz drum solos, using brushes on the cymbals in a manner now missing in jazz. For his little act, Sonny would flip his sticks over his shoulders, throw them in the air, and pass them from hand to hand, without missing a beat, but only when he was handling the rhythm. When he tried his magician's act during his solo, he should have stayed home. His playing was a happy bitch, but he dropped, or did not catch his wood twelve times during the solos, remarkably without missing a beat, or by picking it up with his bass. At first the viewer was excited with his dexterity, but the man blew it during the solo as he certainly attempted to spin those chops in a way impossible for him, maybe it was a bad night. In any event, the audience appreciated the magic act, and loved his drumming.

The Basie orchestra played 17 songs in 90 minutes. When it was over, the audience cheered in vain for a return. The band smiled, the Count looked to the wildly cheering fans and calmly made a quick exit to the sanity of the bus.

—OOOOO—

The Count would not answer any questions involving personality or musical arguments between the artists during the press conference held afterwards. At no time would he say anything negative about any musician. Politics are not the man's bag. When asked his opinion of rock music today, the Count surprised this writer and all present with "I don't know man, like I've got no opinion." When asked who he thought was the best female singer, the Count looked to the ceiling, drank some water, puffed on his cigar, looked the foxy female Collegian columnist in the eye, nodded his head and laid it out "Listen deary, I've got my ideas on that, but I'm not saying anything — suppose I leave somebody out."

When asked of the validity of rock, and if he felt that the music of today would offer great standards as the days of old, Count finally allowed a quote "The Beatles are a great talent, some of the music will be played forever. The standards of the Beatles are beautiful — I think you'll be hearing their songs for a long time to come."

Since the Count was ready to be quoted, he answered a question about Sinatra. "He's the main man — number one — did some albums with him, played some clubs, he's the one — ole blue eyes has it together."

One reporter informed the Count of a successful revival of swing clubs on Bourbon Street in New Orleans. "Man, that's good — I'm glad to see a successful revival. We are getting more job offers this year than in the recent past. We work over two hundred nights a year — no we're not going to work more nights, but it's nice to know we're wanted." The Count's main dates are the college circuit. "That's where it's at — the dates, the audience, the money — most college audiences are receptive and good to play for. There is an occasional night where the band and audience do not click — but — ha — what can I say?"

When asked about current successful acts using techniques and styles of the forties, the Count confessed he has not had time to view them due to his busy schedule. "No, I have not seen Midler or the Pointers, though I enjoy their sound. When the time comes for me to see Issac Hayes — you better believe I'll be there — the man has some fine — very fine — things happening."

The inevitable cub reporter's question brought the normal response: "Count did you ever have a time when you were afraid you would not be a success?" The Count replied, "Music was never a career in my mind — I did not care — all I wanted to do was play. If I made it big — New York — that was fine, as long as I played. If I missed on Broadway, it was back to Kansas City — and the way it is with me and Kansas City — I would not have minded playing there forever."

The final question of the evening offered a clear view of the man and his ideas of music and success. When asked about the New York Dolls, or other glitter rock groups of today, the Count confessed no knowledge of them. "I have not seen them or heard their music, but I'll tell you man — I don't care if it is a fad or hot style — if it's a way for the musicians to achieve success — man, anything goes. If they can make it — kool, kool, yes I do believe that if one wants success in this business, they have to work for it — and I believe in using any means necessary for success."

The Count's manager arrived. The Master knew it was time to board the bus for another overnighter, in another town, with another college audience and most likely another press conference. With sincerity, the Count said "Thank You" and excused himself. Those present at the conference stood and applauded the man — he smiled, donned his cap and winked his eye — that female reporter shore did catch his eye.

BASIE

by John Cahill

Basie — A Short Appreciation

There have been more exciting days for the Count Basie band than the most recent ones. During the thirties and forties, Bill Basie's Kansas City boys were just about the big band in the country, and proved it nearly every night of the week. When tenor players Lester Young and Herschel Evans stepped to the front mikes to duel each other with the brass kicking and roaring all around them and the drums goosing along, it must have seemed as if the Savoy Ballroom was about to come asunder. The whole band was young then and, as the Count said, "didn't even think of not making it."

Thirty years later, the 1974 version of the band played a concert at the UMass Student Union Ballroom. Now they are less frantic and more loosely professional, sounding and feeling much like "a coiled spring", as critic Dan Morgenstern once said, keeping their energy compressed until they really have need of it. Still in all, what the audience heard was good, time-tested Basie music, and they dug it.

Al Grey's gutbucket trombone was as vital and exciting as ever on "The Meeting", and tenor man Jimmy Forrest, playing in the Southwest-Coleman Hawkins tradition, blew an excellent solo on "Body and Soul", his melodic ideas leaping from his horn as smoothly and as surely as the road before you when you drive.

Those in the audience who really knew what was going on were the large contingent of old hipsters who were young when Basie was young, and had grown old as gracefully as he. They grooved very highly during "Corner Pocket," "April in Paris" and especially with "One O'Clock Jump" as the band swung happily and easily into their perennial closing theme. All reet!

PAUL SIMON — LIVE RHYMIN' (Columbia)

Over time Paul Simon has lost nothing as a poet-storyteller-minstrel. This is made quite clear on Live Rhymin'. The album is a collection of his older songs mixed with his newer ones, all recorded live. It includes "Me and Julio Down By The Schoolyard", an extremely pleasant version of "Homeward Bound", "American Tune", "El Condor Pasa", a great "Duncan", and the best version of "The Boxer" I have ever heard. Urubamba play an interesting rhythm behind Simon's unusually dynamic vocals.

The other side of the album is not such a gem. The gospel arrangements of "Mother and Child Reunion", "Loves Me Like A Rock", "Sounds of Silence" (especially) just don't seem to add anything to the songs. I have yet to understand why "Jesus Is The Answer" is included in the collection. It is not a Paul Simon song, nor is it good, even as a gospel tune. "Bridge Over Troubled Waters" would be better without the organ and female vocals, but it is so much better than Senator Sam's that it can be forgiven. The album ends with the Paul Simon the world remembers, just him and his guitar, singing "America". It is true, "after changes we are more or less the same".

— Tyla Michelove

Just a few words to supplement Tyla's review. I can't quite bring myself up to acknowledge Live Rhymin' as a major new release because its rewards lie only in re-interpretation, but Simon does manage to pull a few tricks during the course of the record. "Bridge" is further gospel-ized by the addition of the Jesse Dixon Group and a rougher, soulful sound. "The Sound of Silence", probably the S&G song I'm most tired of hearing, emerges with new depth and dimension, once again, due to the gospel backing. "The Boxer" has no garish wall-of-sound production this time around. The words are clearer and the ending is, thank God, shorter.

Two other Simon classics — "American Tune" and "America" — vary little from the originals, which is to the album's detriment. All the same, it's good to once again hear "America", my favorite Simon song (I know lots of girls named Kathy). Audience reaction peaks during this last song. Throughout the record, applause from immediate recognition resounds, but during "America" the audience becomes most involved;" 'Kathy', I said as we boarded a Greyhound in Pittsburg" (applause)," 'Michigan seems like a dream to me now' " (applause)... "Counting the cars on the New Jersey Turnpike..." (applause).

Live Rhymin' asks the musical question, "Why would Paul Simon, a nice Jewish boy from Brooklyn, perform a song called "Jesus Is the Answer?", and answer it with a defiant "Why not?" It's another in a fine line of Columbia products. (We're even, Peter.)

LONDON UNDERGROUND
HERBIE MANN(Atlantic)
Time: 44:29

London Underground easily beats anything Herbie Mann has done in recent memory. His two previous studio albums that I've heard, Push-Push and Turtle Bay, were good, but nothing really outstanding save for one or two cuts. London fuses the best from both discs to create an almost flawless album.

Is Art Going The Same Route As The 40 Cent Gallon Of Gas?

by B. J. Roche and G. Gomes

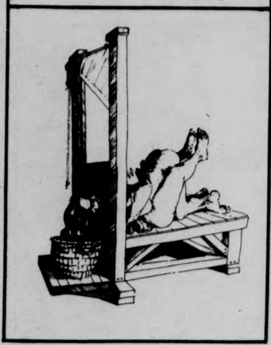
"Slave Ship," a play written by Black author Imanu Amiri Baraka, to have been produced by the Anti Imperialist Theatre Collective, will not be shown this year, due, not to a lack to interest, but to a lack of money.

The Anti Imperialist Theatre Collective was organized in early February by Mfundi Vundla, a 1972 graduate of the University, in conjunction with the Southwest Center for Racial Understanding. The main objectives were to produce plays which would not be produced elsewhere, and in the process make definitive statements opposing racism and imperialism. The Collective was intended to provide each person with a background in a variety of concepts involving the production of a play.

About forty people are involved in the collective, including people working on the technical aspects and public relations as well as acting. But there were problems.

The set for "Slave Ship" was estimated to cost approximately $7,000, and musicians had to be paid as well. In the search for funds, difficulties arose from the fundamental premise of the group. Whoever funded the group had a bureaucratic control over it, which was one of the things the group was fighting. An appeal went to various Third World Student Organizations, but since Campus groups have strict allocations from the Student Senate, it was virtually impossible for these groups to give the Collective any financial support. "They all appreciated what we were doing," says Vundla, "but money is very tight."

Vundla, a native of South Africa, has worked in Johannesburg with promotion of the arts, as well as having worked in theatres in East Windsor, Conn. His prime target in South Africa, as well as UMass, is to make people aware of the exploitation of Third World Countries by U. S. corporations. The philosophy is that when people are made aware, change will come. Vundla sees the situation in South Africa as changing.



For now the Collective is still in existence, and working on the strategy needed to obtain funds for next year. But it is all a matter of where the priorities for funding will go.

This leads us to another problem which Vundla sees as relevant: a trend toward a lack of progressive arts. There is no independent resident Black theatre group on campus, and most of the theatre groups are geared toward the classics. Vundla disagrees with this action. "There's a lot happening now," he said.

New Art on the UMass Campus

Most unfortunately, since so many have so much to offer, we find our channels of expression being closed to us on the UMass campus. This is not to cast aspersions on any single artistic co-ordination group on campus (since most of them have been doing well by their own standards), but to cast aspersions on the budgeting procedures for so many of these groups...

Various agencies on campus have the power to fund to a vast degree, the Administration among them. And fund people they do, but the manner in which priorities are picked are SAFE. Pretty non-controversial stuff. Instead of having an energy wave, encouraging creativity and vitality, we have a general blanking out of creative energies — something actually out of control of the average student.

So, I'm asking, to those who allocate monies — Where is your sense of urgency, of importance, on this campus? Are we going to foster upon the students of UMass, a place you can go for a few years, get a diploma, and have nothing to really educate them? Are we going to actively support alternative systems of education and art, or are we going to go on assuming that everything is basically cool right now (when it's not)?

I'm waiting for an answer — can you give me one? Or will alternative art groups like the Anti-Imperialist Theatre Collective suffer oblivion?

A Night at Rachid's

by Kevin Mack

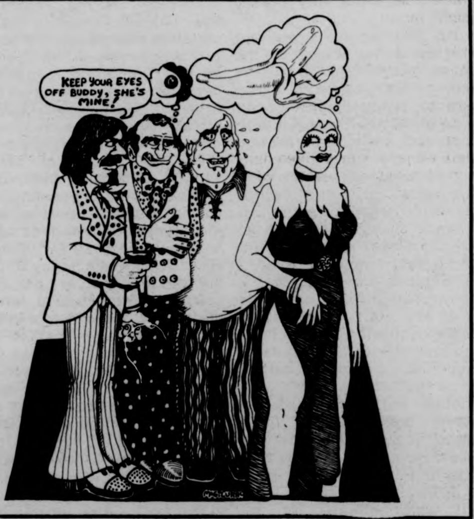
In the Mountain Farm's Mall, between Almy's and Woolworth's caged puppies and frozen pizzas, there is a place called Rachid's.

Arrive. Approximately 9:00. Am overwhelmed by the transplanted Las Vegas, imitation Taj Mahal interior. Indian patterned nylon carpets line the walls and ceilings, extending from which are gold colored lanterns, straight out of a low-budget Hollywood Arabian Nights. A buck for a beer! (The bartender gets very angry if he's asked for a draft —this is a classy place after all — and classy places do not serve draft beer).

Four Monster speakers are roaring at the dance floor. Right now its "I always love my Mama". The music is mostly good funky soul. A faceted, mirrored globe is revolving from the ceiling, illumining the crowd with shafts of white light. Colored spotlights flash overhead — red, orange, blue, red, orange, blue, (faster still) red, orange, blue (flashing, seemingly in time with the music). Exactly eighteen people are approximately dancing on the diminutive floor. A woman in a long black dress, with a neckline which almost reaches her navel is making a noble effort to dance. A slender lovely stands on the steps to the lounge staring a well-rehearsed Vogue model's mysterious, 'I don't give a fuck,' stare.

Painted Women. They are everywhere. More makeup on these girls than in all of Kappa Kappa Gamma and Sigma Phi combined.

Three or four beers later. More people are dancing: Slender Lovely with Smiling Young Executive (Navy blue baggies, plaid shirt, platforms and hair spray); the girl in the long black dress with a guy wearing a sleek white chemise, with equally plunging neckline. There is a symmetry to all of this. Stevie Wonder's voice blares from the ceiling mounted speakers, crooning, "I was made to love her".



KEEP YOUR EYES OFF BUDDY, SHE'S MINE!

Mingling. Fragmants of conversations are overheard. "Keep your eyes off buddy, she's mine . . . Check out the honey on the dance floor with the red dress on . . ." Dr. John "I was in the right place, but it must have been the wrong time." is playing. Slender Lovely is still with Still Smiling Young Exec. The neckline of the girl in the black dress has plunged too deeply, exposing one large (surprisingly un-made-up) nipple. Her new found friend reaches over table and kindly recloses the scenery for her. She giggles.

Another buck. Another beer. (Last one of each) Drink it quickly, while watching the crowd. Slender Lovely is sitting down now with Ever Smiling Young Exec. She gives him a contented glance, allows him to put his arm over her shoulder, leans back slightly, and crosses her legs in his direction.

Finish beer and head for exit. A heavy set black bouncer smiles a "Take care" smile as he lets in one of the waiting queue. Archie Bell's voice can be heard well into the parking lot, singing, "Why Don't you Tighten Up?"

Stay of Execution

STAY OF EXECUTION — a sort of memoir by Stewart Alsop Lippincott Publishers $8.95

reviewed by Joan Fassnacht

Stewart Alsop writes in Stay of Execution, "I have quite often wondered what it would be like to be told that I had an inoperable and lethal cancer."

On July 6, 1971 he found out when doctors at Georgetown University Hospital told him that he had a type of leukemia that would kill him within two years. For Alsop, those secret fears become a stark reality as he learned to live from day to day with a terminal disease and an uncertain future.

Alsop's coverage of what he terms this "interesting experience" is probably his best and most moving writing ever. Although I have not read any of his previous books (all political in nature), I have been an avid Alsop-reader since the inception of his political column in Newsweek in 1968. It is especially touching to see another side of this stern, political critic as he reveals his very private, very human experiences, thoughts, and fears concerning his ordeal.

Although the uncertainity of his future has prompted Alsop to write this book, he is not concerned with his death, but rather writes in celebration of his life, his family, and friends. The book is written on two levels, however, as Alsop masterfully weaves together a suspenseful tale of medical detection with anecdotes from his "sort of memoir" of his past.

The tale of medical detection centers around the doctors' valiant attempts at the National Institutes of Health in Bethesda, Maryland to figure out exactly what ails Alsop. Although originally diagnosed as suffering from AML (acute myeloblastic leukemia) and given a survival time of about a year, Alsop's peculiar disease stubbornly refused to behave like AML. His disease is mysterious and confounds the many doctors who attempt its puzzle. Finally, an official diagnosis is decided upon — "smoldering leukemia" — a very rare kind of leukemia which may lie dormant for years before breaking out into the lethal form of acute leukemia. Alsop is given his stay of execution.

Alsop writes, "For there was always a little pea of fear at the back of my mind. It was the fear of death. It was always present, like a kind of background music. Sometimes it receeded almost into inaudibility, and then sometimes it would come blaring back, accompanied by a sense of incredulity. My God, I really do have cancer, and I really am going to die."

To combat his fears of death, Alsop turns his thoughts back to the past. We are treated to anecdotes of his prolific, sometimes eccentric, but always amusing assortment of ancestors, relatives, and friends. The story I liked the best concerns Alice Roosevelt Longworth, and her reaction to Alsop's disease. He writes, "I also found amusing and oddly comforting a note which arrived with a very pretty flower from Alice Longworth-Cousin Alice, as I've called her for more than forty years. It was scribbled on a yellowed calling card — the card looked as though it dated from the twenties — and it read: 'Stew — what a nuisance — love from your aged doz.' Acute leukemia — a nuisance? The note is a nice example of Mrs. Longworth's highly idiosyncratic style, which shapes her rather macabre humor. She has had two mastectomies and likes to refer to herself, preferably before the most easily shockable audience, as 'Washington's topless octogenarian."

Alsop has enjoyed a happy marriage (with his English wife Tish, whom he married during World War II), six children, and an interesting, absorbing career as a political journalist. His adventures—especially those during the War—are hilarious, and add to the delightful informal tone of this memoir. Another treat, ten pages of pictures from the Alsop family album, introduce you to the family members and friends who Alsop writes about.

If you're looking for amusing, highly moving, informative and well-written book, run, don't walk to your nearest bookstore, plunk down $8.95 (ouch!), and set aside a long evening to absorb yourself in one of the finest books to hit the shelves in a long time.

Moorcock's "Power of Illusion"

An Alien Heat
By
Michael Moorcock
Harper Books $.95

Review by Gary Gomes

Speculative fiction has had a heyday since the mid-60's. Previously scorned because of old prejudices of professors in Universities, science fiction has become RESPECTABLE. Despite the strength of the form's first exponents (Wells, Verne, etc.), the form was still basically distrusted — how much can you accomplish by establishing future histories and societies? What would that mean to us?

Alvin Toffler and that ilk have been putting out a timid variety of speculative fiction, most of which are called "social forecasting" by the type of Orwellian Newspeak that dominates our life. Toffler is trusted, because he has political and economic push; also he guarantees the outcome will be as he predicts; something speculative (or Science) fiction has very wisely not claimed for itself. This science fiction then, is based on a system of possibilities — nothing more, nothing less. Orwell, Huxley, Burgess and Moorcock have been the 2nd and third generation of science fiction writers in this vein, with Heinlein, Asimov and others taking up the entire "future history" format that was developed by Wells and Verne, lo, those long years ago.

An Alien Heat presents just such a society — not really a Brave New World formal — but more advanced. The people have complete control over time travel, so they fear nothing. Aliens who do manage to land on the earth are kept as "cute pets" by the earthlings. The sovietal structure is Brave New World gone one better. No pain, relative immortality, really complete control of nature, and a control of time travel (relatively). Everything is aimed at one thing — pleasure. Subsequently the main character, Jherek, like any good little boy in the heroic fashion, acts upon an impulse and decides to learn by experience, just what anguish, emotion, and heartbreak mean; since these words mean little if anything to him, in this future society.

The object of his affections is a Mrs. Amelia Underwood, who got scooped up in a time loop from somewhere in 19th Century England, and entered, "the sum of all ages". She does what any self-respecting English wife would do, and summarily flips out at Jherek's attempt to be her lover. When she finally gets sent back to her own time, Jherek follows, and comes back to 19th century England, where he is finally hung for several anti-social acts and brought back to his own time. At the end, he considers the emotions he's been through.

Of course, Moorcock's talent with language and imaginative backdrops are excellent, and would be the perfect type of story to fit to a comic medium, along with science fiction, both most sorely maligned and indigenous art forms. Moorcock is excellent on characterization and dialogue; his word structures are amazing. An Alien Heat has at least as much merit as something like Future Shock, and it can teach us a great deal about our current culture without the fictional pretense our frightening reality, with immense power of illusion.

SAL OF THE GREY WAVES
by Barbara Barros

May I caution you: she is really flipped out.

I was really going to get this story done, but she called half way here, and there is a thing known as kin responsibility. Besides this story, I have a million and one excuses, but I told her, "Yes, come on over. It will be good to see you, Sal."

My mother had so many children she didn't have to do anything. Well, she did go to church, WASP. Away or at home Father was always working, although sometimes he'd take a few of us to a Saturday matinee musical or to the museum. I suspect that Sal's turn came up rather often.

Sal took after Father, a studious, scientific mind, a physicist and a theologian, King of his castle, and extremely irrational it seemed to me. I never tried to reason with Father. I just avoided the back of his hand. You can't communicate with such people. Once I tried to reason with Sal. I got so frustrated, I took a tomato and squished it in her hair. I feel really badly about having done it.

I know she's arrived when salt water taffy begins shooting through the mail slot. Sal introduces her two friends - Little Wolf, a Cheyenne from Boston, and John who they had picked up at her psychiatrists farm last night.

Sal's wearing a blue denim midi skirt over brown corduroys. Under her blue denim jacket she had a sweatshirt with Linus and blanket pronouncing: "No problem is so big or so complicated that it can't be run away from." She jangles with necklaces, bracelets, earings, and rings.

As usual her arms and shoulders are full - this time with an embroidered army knapsack, three wrinkled brown paper bags, and a purple satchel from some boutique in Harvard Square. One paper bag has beer, beernuts, and Mateus: another, the taffy and a present for me - a rubber place-mat from Howard Johnson's with a photo of the Grand Tetons. I know the others are full of her latest favorite possessions which she carries everywhere. You can tell a lot about a woman from the contents of her purse: old letters from highschool boy friends, a hairbrush, paintbrushes, a pink toothbrush, a toy orangutan, a copy of Boston After Dark, blue pills, theater programs, green baby shoes Father had given her at birth, strawflowers, The Sensuous Woman by J, a plastic flute, orange pills, purple pills, Indian beadcraft, her passport, candle wax, a pouch of pot. French wine corks, a coffee house menu, incense, scarfs and necklaces, a photo of Father, her poems about reincarnation and knights riding down Comm. Ave. - I will have to read the latest ones-, and of course, her sketch pad which she pulls from the depths and shows me. There is a magic-marker drawing of a woman with frizzy hair and pursed purple-lips. There is also a recepe for Fitzerald Mousse:

Prepare one day in advance. Preheat oven 350

Cook over lowheat until dissolved but not brown in color:

3 Cool-Aid ice cubes in 2-4 tbls. distilled Quinine water.

Fold in 5 stiffly beaten egg whites.

Add 1 cup diced chocolate chips.

Knead until as slow as molasses running up hill in January.

Form into loaves or serve at once with lemon slices.

You take after your father.

You are just like your father.

"My wisdom teeth are bleeding—I'm taking a leave of absence from B.U."

"I'm on my own. Mother gives me $10 a week for food, but I live on my own money - the insurance money.

"Where are your wine glasses?"

I talk with John about the Grand Tetons.

"I'm giving a party Sunday. I'm cooking turkey and Chocolate Mousse. You can come." Sal stops at the mirror and brushes down the two side panels of her orange hair. The back is a mass of soft snarls.

You have your father's looks.

You are just like your father.

"I'm starting a free school at the farm."

"I'm glad I don't smoke cigarettes."

"I think I will take my exams. I don't have to go to class. My teachers understand me."

Her lack of responsibility is disgusting.

I am jealous of her freedom.

AUTUMN'S GOLD

How is it the leaves always know when to turn and fall and we always seem to pull out the pain like salt water taffy, unwilling to go.
When we first fell in love each kiss was drawn out to eternity let's make sure we don't change that loving feeling, the wanting to share to be one. Change it to eternal hell.
I want us always to be friends
if not lovers, so when the feeling starts to fade, take a lesson from autumn's gold and then go on your way.

No objection from Nixon

House to get secret report on Nixon's role

WASHINGTON (AP) - The U.S. Court of Appeals refused yesterday to withhold a secret grand jury report on President Nixon's role in Watergate from the House impeachment investigation.

The court set a 5 p.m. EDT Monday deadline on submitting the material to the committee "to permit petitioners to apply to the Supreme Court."

The six judges on the appeals court noted that "it is of significance that the President of the United States, who is described by all parties as the focus of the report and who presumably would have the greatest interest in its disposition, has interposed no objection" to the action of the district court ordering that the report be delivered to the House.

Attorneys for H.R. Haldeman and John D. Ehrlichman, two of the Watergate cover-up defendants, had opposed giving the House the grand jury's report and material on grounds that if information from the report leaked out, their clients might not be able to get a fair trial.

John Bray, an attorney representing Gordon Strachan, said he will have to study the court's findings before deciding whether to carry the case to the Supreme Court.

John J. Wilson, attorney for Haldeman, said, "We haven't decided what to do."

But Wilson's partner, Frank Strickler, said, "My thoughts are this is the end of the line...I think we have exhausted all reasonable channels for judicial review."

All three attorneys said they would make their final decisions on Monday.

One of the six judges, George E. MacKinnon, dissented in part from the majority.

He said that his review of the materials convinces him the "the grand jury exceeded its authority in releasing the report."

The appeals court said that the grand jury characterized the material as bearing upon its inquiry into possible ground for impeachment of the Presidnnt.

In arguments before the court earlier in the day Assistant Special Prosecutor Philip Lacovara said the material includes "an index which lists events involving the President which the grand jury found may be important or pertinent to the inquiry."

A deadline of Thursday had been set by U.S. District Judge John J. Sirica, who Social action groups still low budget priority

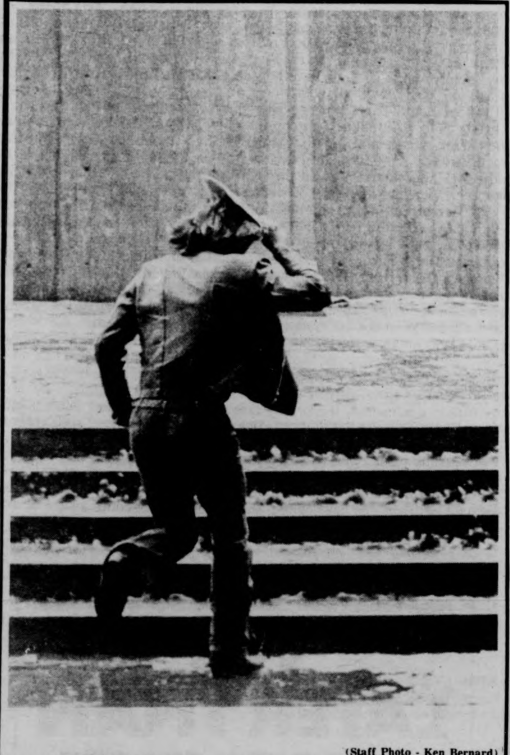
By MARK VOGLER
MDC Staff



(Staff Photo - Ken Bernard)

QUESTION: Why is this man running?

The student senate Wednesday evening killed a motion to elevate in priority the funding for social action groups.

Prior to the budget session, student senate leaders indicated "likely" budget cuts of those which direct student expertise toward off campus targets—claiming it should be the state's responsibility to fund them.

In so doing, the senate placed in jeopardy the effective continuance of these organizations.

The groups include the Northampton State Hospital Volunteers, Belchertown Volunteers and Project Boltwood) serving Belchertown State School), Northern Educational Services (providing educational tutoring for inner city children in Greater Springfield) and the Prisoners Education Program.

Social action is classified in category number six out of a total of eight categories. A motion was denied by the senate to place the groups in category four.

Brian Allard, a UMass student coordinating support for the groups, in a floor speech before the senate charged its members with "opposing progressive social action."

"The charge that these groups use student money off-campus to fulfill state responsibilities is not at all true. These programs train several hundreds of students on campus and so constitute an intergral part of our education here at the University while also having an immeasurable impact on the population they serve," Allard said.

"The state is not taking care of these people. Accordingly, five or six years ago the University moved in to fill the gap with the students' skills, expertise and money.

"If the University is to continue to be an agent of social change in Western Massachusetts—rather than an enforcer of the status quo & those social change agents cannot be sabotaged by cutbacks or termination of funding."

Representatives of the five groups, including Dr. Benjamin Ricci, president of the Belchertown State School Friends Association, attended the senate session in order to request that they be placed higher on the priorities list.

Chancellor Randolph W. Bromery, prior to the senate meeting issued a statement supporting the social action groups.

"The University has demonstrated a commitment to these outreach programs, and a withdrawal of support from any sector would have a very profound impact on the deserving people served by these programs," Bromery said.

"We recognize that there are those who argue that it is the state's responsibility; however, the University community is also part of the State and therefore has its obligations and responsibilities."

Tuesday, Gov. Francis W. Sargent told the campus newsmen that he would have his staff check to see whether the state is adequately subsidizing the University social action groups.

Dorm system overhaul proposed

By LAWRENCE KORNFELD
MDC Staff

A proposal for reorganizing the residence hall system has been drawn up by Robert Gage Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs, Mike West Dean of Students, and Ken Dean among others.

The proposal lists the most significant problems in the system as:

The rising cost of dorm living
Inefficiency of operation and Rapidly escallating legal pressure to allow students 18 and over to live off campus.

One of the goals of the proposed system is to develope a "staff of professional personnel who subscribe to common goals." The proposal explains that; "Students must have a prominent role in determining policies, but management must be a perogative of the professional staff.

Another major goal is greater diversity in living opportunities. To help achieve this dorm would be divided into specialized roles like "Quiet Dorms", "Freshmen Dorms", and "Upper-class houses".

Among the proposal's recomendations was; "Review the Residential College program, Project 10, specialty programs, for possible change (or elimination)."

The proposal stresses that;"....unity of leadership is essential. The current duplication of effort, including the 'loyal opposition', is counter productive."

Another recomendation was that head of residences switch positions with some of the Physical Plant personnel.

The proposal stated that; "Creation of a separate bargaining unit for residence hall janitors would be attempted and could become a thorny issue."

This proposal has been circulated to all Area Directors and Staff, and Area Business Staff.

Federal grant to aid handicapped students

By MARY MYER
MDC Staff

Concern for handicapped students at UMass is expressed by the determination of individuals working through the Office of Handicapped Students Affairs, who are presently working toward obtaining a $400,000 federal grant for improvements in building accessibility and transportation.

According to Kris Fletcher, who initiated fund raising for improvements on this campus, people tend to forget that the right of handicapped persons to an education is greatly affected by the accessibility of buildings on college campuses. We must also realize, she noted, that it is difficult for temporarily handicapped students, with broken legs or sprained ankles and the like, to get around.

Steps are now being taken toward presentation of the proposal of a federal grant. Ms. Fletcher, a senior BDIC Physical Therapy major, is gathering information about buildings on campus with the aid of her dorm mates in Lewis. Lewis residents are filling out questionnaires concerning conditions of bathrooms, drinking fountains, stairways, and labelling, and the accessibility of telephones, fire alarms, etc. and returning them to Ms. Fletcher.

Peggy Stevens, coordinator of Handicapped Student Affairs, with the aid of Tom Glynn, is working on details of estimates, which they are modeling after a similar grant which was obtained at the University of Ohio.

The grant proposal contains three major objectives:

—Improvement of the transportation system. This could be done by 1) modifying the present bus system, 2) by acquiring handicap vans specially equipped with elevators and wide doors, 3) by providing small, three-wheeled carts for the use of handicapped students, or by any combination of these.

—General building improvements which would meet federal requirements so that labeling could be completed.

—Construction of curb ramps at crosswalks, intersections, and at intervals of specific distances that accord to federal standards.

The Office of Handicapped Student Affairs estimates that it would take three years and $400,000 to renovate the present conditions on campus.

If the federal grant is approved, work could begin next year.

Things got off to a start for Ms. Fletcher last year, when the senior class of '73 donated $6,000 toward her fund, and an additional $1200 was raised in last year's Diet Marathon, in which participants raised money for pounds lost. The budget is now under control of the Office of Handicapped Student Affairs in Whitmore.

Initially, the funds were to be used in the following ways:

—To publish a guide book for physically disabled students. Such a book, Campus Guide for the Physically Disabled, was prepared by Marie J. Desmond, and printed free of charge by the UMass print shop. Ms. Desmond was given an honorarium for her efforts. The booklet is obtainable at the informary and at Handicapped Student Affairs.

—To label access ways with international pictograms. Although 80 per cent of the buildings on campus are functionally accessible, labeling can only be done in legally accessible buildings, which are few. By legally accessible, it is meant that they meet specific federal standards.

—To mark elevators with raised numbers and letters for the blind. This has been done in several duildings.

The Physical Plant has been extremely cooperative in making maintenance repair jobs, by responding to proposals from the office. One such accomplishment was the improvement of the condition of the ramp at the rear of the Student Union.

The condition of the libary is good. One possible improvement would be to supply it with a type of closed circuit T.V. system which would enable residually blind students to read books and magazines they would otherwise not be able to use. Braille editions of Webster's Dictionary (36 volumns), and the World Book Encyclopedia (200 plus volumn) were donated through George Trelease of the Massachusetts Commission for the Blind. They were received February 5.

Dormitory conditions are generally poor, except in Southwest, which is well-equipped with elevators and amps. However, handicapped students tend to be older and may find it difficult to adjust to dormitory living, preferring alternate living situations, according to Ms. Stevens.

Anti-nuclear plant activities increase

By DENNY MATTEAU
MDC Staff

Visible anti-nuclear plant activity has increased lately, ranging from the dramatic toppling of Northeast Utilities weather tower in Montague and the formation of a new political party there, to the circulation of information and petitions by CEQ to the research and legislative proposals being done by Mass PIRG, The Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group.

These groups are all working on one issue, the building of nuclear power plants, and from the same set of concerns and accusations: that the AEC (Atomic Energy Commission) does not have enough concrete knowledge of the consequences of nuclear power and how to deal with those consequences, that the AEC and utility companies have not been straightforward in publicizing information about nuclear hazards; and that in spite of all possible solutions to natural nuclear hazards there will always be the danger of terrorists sabotaging plants.

The groups are not working together. They represent a wide spectrum of philosophies as to how the battle should be fought. This has especially been reflected in the reaction to Sam Lovejoy's less subtle approach. A spokesman for CEQ, Justin Milliun, said yesterday that CEQ could not condone Lovejoy's "civil disobedience" because they felt that the wreckage of the tower was potentially divisive, that it would alienate too many people who would otherwise be actively against the nuclear plants. "That's why we can't officially support him." said Milliun.

Seth Many, a member of the newly forming Nuclear Objectors Party, complained that MassPIRG was not showing any enthusiasm for the N.O. Party. In a Collegian interview, Dodie Katzenstein, a MassPIRG staffer, explained that the format under which MassPIRG is a corporation does not allow it to support political groups. "We can't support N.O. Party, and we can't support the Democrats or Republicans either." she said.

"I don't really know what the N.O. Party is involved with, she said, "although I have spoken with Seth Many on the telephone. Involvement at the local level is very important, but in the end, it doesn't matter whether Montague wants that plant or not. The AEC has the authority to put it there anyway. If just makes it easier for them (the AEC) if the taxpayers don't fight."

Katzenstein added, "MassPIRG is a statewide organization and works on a statewide basis. We're presently involved with a bill to transfer authority over these plants from the industries to the states. Rep. James Collins (D-Amherst) is sponsoring House Bill 2373 to expand the tax basis of the plants to the communities that would be affected, as well as the one in which the plant is located; and to establish safety requirements. If we were to concentrate on the local instead of the state level a town like Montague might win its battle, and the plant would simply appear in another town."

The local nuclear story in Montague has not had a smooth history. Ralph Gordon, SPRINGFIELD UNION Greenfield Bureau Chief, wrote a column on January 25, '74 in which he said N.U. (Northeast Utilities, the company responsible for the Montague twin nuclear plant) refused to acknowledge, on the night of December 27, that the NU Board of Directors that afternoon had approved the designation of Montague as a 'primary' site for the twin plants."

He further charged that both William Semanie, and Northeast Utilities public relations man, and the Montague Selectmen failed to publicize an important meeting between them and N.U., a meeting which was supposed to have been open to the public.

PREP: teaching about correctional systems

By PAUL BRADLEY
MDC Staff

The Prisoner's Rights and Education Program (PREP) is a new organization on campus which is looking for interested students to participate in it. The group, which co-sponsored the recent visit to UMass of John O. Boone, is seeking to educate interested students about our penal system as it exists today.

Ernie Reis, a graduate student at UMass who is helping the coordination of PREP, says that the goals of this group, while not yet clearly defined, are generally to educate students at UMass about one of our more significant social systems, the correctional system. Reis points out the need for student awareness in this area. Although there is a formal involvement of our correctional system with the university, there is no large mass of students involved. Students today are still a viable force in our society" he said, "and the only people who don't recognize this are the students themselves."

The program currently receives the cooperation of the Berkshire County Jail. Reis pointed out the need for students to have the actual prison experience and said that there are five UMass students currently incarcerated in the Berkshire County Jail on a volunteer basis. PREP is now seeking volunteers to go through the same type of experience this summer, pending approval of the sheriff of Berkshire county.

PREP plans an organizational meeting on Monday at 3 p.m. in room 803 Campus Center to clearly define the goals for which the group should strive. Already considered to be general goals are dealing with ex-offenders in the areas of job discrimination and placement. Berkshire County Jail currently has a program for dealing with ex-offenders and PREP hopes to get students involved in this also. Other areas being explored for specific goals include prisoner education, as well as the raising and allocation of funds for the operation of this program.

PREP wants to deal with the institutions in the area--Berkshire County and Northampton--before considering expansion of the program on a statewide basis. Long range goals include possibly the forming of a nationwide program of this type.

"Ninety per cent of the people currently in our prisons don't belong there," says Reis, "and the more students become aware of and involved in our social institutions, the less baloney can be fed to them."

This group is currently in the planning stages. What PREP is looking for are students who want to get involved in and become aware of, first hand, what the problems are as they exist in our prison system today. No special qualifications are needed, only a desire to become aware of and effect some change in our controversial penal system.

MARATHON

"This marathon will be the biggest and the best one yet," said Sheila Davis Inderlied, coordinator of the Spring '74 Marathon, as she labelled the preliminary schedules for mailing.

By MARY MUIRHEAD
MDC Staff

The Spring Marathon will be held at the School of Education and Marks Meadow Laboratory School during the week of April 15 through 19. Sheila Inderlied, a graduate student in Organizational Development, is coordinating the program along with Robert Evans, Cindy Olken, and Chris Polonski.

So far, over 300 hours of events have been scheduled. Jonathan Kozol, "an educational artist" and author of Death at an Early Age, Open Classroom, and Free Schools, will speak in Mahar Auditorium on Wednesday, April 17 through the cooperative efforts of the Distinguished Visitors Program and the Marathon.

Other events include a whole day devoted to alternative schools, a "Sports Day", and Science Fiction movies. "Dr. Strangelove" will be shown twice on April 15 in the Marks Meadow Auditorium through the cooperation of Dan Lucid (Comparative Literature) and the Marathon.

This spring, there is more cross-campus contribution than ever before. People from the art, music, and entomology departments are contributing events. The Marathon is free. It is for everybody - not just education majors.

Full-time UMass students may earn up to two University credits by signing the rosters at each Marathon event attended.

Non-students can get credit through the Continuing Education Program. One full credit costs $27.

People will be available during the Marathon for information regarding these matters.

Senate approves budget schedule

By MICHAEL HENAULT
MDC Staff

Wednesday night's Student Senate meeting saw the final approval of this year's budgeting schedule. The "System of Priority Categories" was OK'd by voice vote with no serious opposition. The passage of the measure is a triumph for the Senate leadership who guided the plan for allocation to all RSO groups through the Senate for final passage.

Approval took place after lengthy debate over the status of Social Action Groups. PrOponents of higher spending in the area of social action wished to move their organizations from Category VI to Category IV. Strong opposition came from the Budget Committee and its Chairperson Peter Birnbaum. Birnbaum defended the priority categories as they came out of his committee. The Senate sustained his arguments.

The main groups affected by the move and those who most vehemently opposed the budgeting system was the Belchertown-Bolton Group. Their amendment to move all of Category VI into Category IV was narrowly defeated. This occured despite a barrage of spokespeople from various organizations and included a message from Chancellor Bromery which attacked some of the Senate's priorities.

Other arguments arose over the International Organization which was moved from Category IX to Category IV, then down to Category VIII and back to IV.

Donald Johnson, Head of Campus Security, answered questions Senate members had concerning the use of weapons by police at the University. Johnson said that several serious weapons had been seized, on most recently in Prince House, and he found it mandatory for the protection of all concerned that police be armed.

Student charged in Pub incident

Fredrick C. Lanata of Hull, Mass., a UMass student, has been charged with assault and battery of a policeman, being a disorderly person, and malicious injury to real property, following an incident outside The Pub on East Pleasant St. at 10:40 p.m. Wednesday.

Amherst police report that Patrolman James S. Doleva received an injury to the head and did not report to work today.

The damaged property was a uniform coat belonging to the town of Amherst.

According to the Clerk's office at Hampshire District Court, Lanata plead not guilty at a hearing Thursday morning. The case has been continued until March 29.

Reorg plan redefines administrative roles

By BARBARA VOORHEES
MDC Staff

An outline of newly redefined administrative functions has been presented to student and faculty representatives for discussion by Chancellor Randolph W. Bromery in the most recent step of his administrative reorganization plan.

Bromery told the Collegian that under his new organizational plan certain related administrative functions (ie. budgeting and accounting) will be joined under the same director.

Bromery also said that he hopes to delegate the authority to make day-to-day decisions to a lower administrative level than that of chancellor and vice-chancellor.

"I feel that a chancellor or vice-chancellor should spend more time on long-range planning and step into some decision making only during crisis situations" said Bromery. "Directors of areas should decide things day to day."

Bromery expects that some new people will be filling administrative jobs under the new organizational structure, some people will be changing jobs and certain positions will be phased out.

see related story, page 1

"If I can't justify a person being in a position, I can't keep him on; it would be a waste of students and taxpayers money," said Bromery.

Bromery reported that areas receiving the most attention in the reorganization are those in which costs have recently increased. These include dining commons, residence halls and the Campus Center.

People in the news

Strom Thurmond, 71, feels 25

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Greenwood, S.C. (AP) — Sen. and Mrs. Strom Thurmond introduced their new baby girl to the news media yesterday and the 71-year-old senator told newsmen: "I feel like about 25."

The baby, still unnamed, is the third child of the senator and 27-year-old wife, who said she was just "thankful at having a little girl safe and health."

Asked if he planned to have any more children, Thurmond, who has a daughter 3 and a year-old boy, replied: "I'm very pleased with the three we have."

SANDSTONE, Minn. (AP) — Dorothy Hawley may be the first woman ever to run a men's prison.

Warden Lawrence Putnam of the Federal Correctional Institution here named Mrs. Hawley "acting warden" Wednesday on her last day before retiring as his secretary.

She took over his office and spent the day as head man of the 565-man medium-security prison.

But, says her husband, John, it was really nothing new for her, because in her more than 31 years as the warden's secretary, "she's broken in all eight wardens the prison here has had."

MEMPHIS, Tenn. (AP) — The audience didn't know it, but every squeal and cheer was recorded for posterity as Elvis Presley wound up a 15-city tour here.

During the 39-year-old singer's 1-hour and 15-minute performance Wednesday night, microphones were set up in the audience and outside the hall to record the squeals, along with "Hound Dog." "Teddy Bear" and other Presley favorites, for an album.

SCHENECTADY, N.Y. (AP) — Officials of Schenectady County Community College believe they may have the oldest student in the country, but she is not, she says, ready for the cane and shawl.

The student in a creative writing course at the college is Alice Scutter, widow of a General Electric executive, and she is 95 years old.

Mrs. Scutter, who has written her memoirs and a book of poetry, said she enrolled in the class "to compare notes with other people who write."

Her instructor, Nancy Thornton, says Mrs. Scutter is "very knowledgeable and most sincere in her classroom discussion."

Onassis oil refinery seen as both security and threat

NEWMARKET, N.H. (AP) - To the workers of Newmarket, who have faced recurring economic hardships since the Great Depression, the possibility that Aristotle Onassis may build a $600 million refinery in their factory town holds the promise of security and a piece of the good life in America.

In neighboring Durham, however, the college-town residents see a refinery as an environmental hazard, a threat to their tradition of self-government, and an intrusion on their lives.

The main street of Newmarket, a town of 3,400 people, snakes alongside a three-story brick and stone mill row for a quarter-mile. Facing the mills are sandwich and pizza shops and a few run-down variety stores. Some stand empty, staring blankly at the factories through dusty windows.

"We've been standing still so long," says Charles Miesowicz, a shoe assembler, heading home from his day shift.

"It (the refinery) would be a big boon to Newmarket."

Meisowicz has been a resident of Newmarket for 25 years. He says he will retire in another five or six years, so he won't get a job at any new refinery. But he thinks it's good for the town's future.

He says he has been to public meetings on the refinery proposal and he says the talk is pretty much for it.

When workers gather at the Polish-American Club, and anyone does raise objections, "...look out, they'll bomb them with everything," Meisowicz laughed.

Beyond the Lamprey River that flows behind the mills, and up the steep hill behind the stores, are rows of tenements where the town's blue-collar workers have lived for generations.

Duane R. Engholm, a mid-westerner who runs one of the pizza parlors on Main Street, says he tends to favor the refinery idea.

"This town needs some industry," he says. "It would definitely help my business."

Engholm came to Newmarket from Michigan because he heard that Rockingham County in southeastern New Hampshire was the fastest growing area in tha nation. He thought it would be the place to start a business.

The people who work in Newmarket factories make less money than most other New Hampshire residents, and they have suffered as New England's textile and shoe industries declined. The median family income in the twon was $3,500 less than in Durham last year. It fell $1,000 short of the state's median family income.

Onassis first proposed his massive 1,200 acre project for Durham which borders Newmarket on Great Bay, a tidal estuary that empties into the Atlantic Ocean at Rye.

Durham's main industry is the 10,000-student University of New Hampshire. The town has had strict zoning regulations for more than 20 years which explicitly prohibit heavy industry.

Recently, the town took on the state legislature and defeated a proposal that would have given the state the right to overrule local zoning ordinances.

Court releases secret report on Nixon's role originally ordered the report given to the House Judiciary Committee for its investigation of whether to recommend impeachment of President Nixon.

The court's decision came just hours after Watergate Special Prosecutor Leon Jaworski announced that he had subpoenaed additional documents from the White House.

In ruling on the grand jury report, the judges referred to the argument that a future trial may possibly be tainted by premature evidence. They described it as "at best a slender interest" on which to deny the House of the Material.

But the court said it was not ruling on that ground.

The defendants "will be free at trial" to raise the claims if they feel damaged by disclosures, the court said, adding that it would be premature to make their speculations the basis of prohibiting transmittal of the material.

The grand jury report and a large satchelful of documents and tapes was handed to Sirica on March 1 by the grand jury that indicted seven former Nixon White House and re-election aides.

An accompanying letter recommended that the judge turn the material over to the Judiciary Committee. The judge held a hearing and then ordered that the jury's will be done.

The appeals judges said they were being asked to employ "our extraordinary powers" to stop the report because Sirica will preside over the cover-up trial.

To do that, the judges said, "is not sound policy" and added:

It almost goes without saying that this is the kind of abuse of discretion or disregard of law" under which its authority was conceived.

MacKinnon, in his dissent, said he would allow the committee to have access both to the testimony that accompanies the grand jury report and to the entire grand jury proceedings only after the federal trials were completed.

"The prosecutor...has indicated that he is knowledgeably and intentionally taking a calculated risk that the transmission of this evidence with the risk of its premature disclosure may make it impossible for those indicted to receive a fair trial," MacKinnon said.

The subpoena served by the special prosecutor's office gives the White House until Monday to comply.

Jaworski would not reveal what was requested but said "it obviously relates to one of the areas we are investigating." Another spokesman said it did not involve the Watergate cover-up or the break-in of Dr. Daniel Ellsberg's psychiatrist's office.

That indicated that the subpoena was in the area of other investigations by the three grand juries-political contributions, the ITT matter, the milk fund case or the 18½-minute gap in one of the White House Watergate tapes.

John J. Wilson, Haldeman's attorney, argued that the grand jury had no right to issue the report and that the judge lacked authority to turn it over to the House.

Lawyer Frank Strickler, who is a member of the firm representing former White House aides H. R. Haldeman and John Erlichman, leaves U. S. District Court in Washington Monday with a copy of U.S. District Judge John Sirica's order that the secret Watergate jury report be delivered to the House Judiciary Committee for its impeachment inquiry.

Dean testimony at Vesco trial delayed

NEW YORK (AP) - The sudden illness of a woman juror interrupted the criminal conspiracy trial of former Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell and ex-Commerce Secretary Maurice H. Stans yesterday as ousted White House counsel John W. Dean III was waiting to take the stand.

The appearance of Dean, described by the government as a critical witness in the case, was deferred until Monday, when the trial is scheduled to resume in U. S. District Court.

Judge Lee Gagliardi announced that juror No. 3, Violet Humbert, had been hospitalized after becoming ill at the hotel where the jurors are sequestered at night.

Gagliardi did not discuss the nature of Mrs. Humbert's ailment. A courtroom source said she suffers from diabetes, but added that it had not been determined whether this was a factor in her illness.

One of the older members of the jury, the white-haired Mrs. Humbert is an apartment house superintendent in the Bronx.

Gagliardi has six alternate jurors available for just such a disablement of a regular panel member. However, he chose to recess until Monday on the chance Mrs. Humbert will be able to resume her seat with three other women and eight men on the regular jury.

Dean, 35, a star witness in last year's Senate Watergate hearings, was on hand in an another room in the U.S. Courthouse when the trial was halted near the end of its fifth week.

Mitchell and Stans are accused of impeding a Securities and Exchange Commission fraud investigation of financier Robert L. Vesco, in return for Vesco's secret $200,000 cash contribution to President Nixon's 1972 re-election campaign.

Dean was ousted as White House counsel last April 30 after admitting a role in covering up the break-in at Democratic national headquarters in the Watergate in Washington June 18, 1972.

U.S. and the world

Kissinger voices concern about upcoming Moscow trip

WASHINGTON (AP) - Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger said yesterday his upcoming trip to Moscow comes at a more difficult time than the periods which marked his previous negotiations in the Soviet Union.

In a news conference he said his journey next week will be made most serious by friction over the Middle East, difficulties involving trade and the status of Soviet Jews and the complexities of nuclear arms limitation.

But, after stating that "we are going there are a more difficult period than at some previous visits," Kissinger added: "I am going there with hope and with the confidence" that the over-riding reality of the need for detente will lead to progress.

Kissinger also was questioned at great length concerning the dispute between the United States and Western Europe.

He said the entire purpose of the United States in seeking a new definition of the Atlantic Alliance relationship is to recognize a new world situation and to "explain that the danger that concerned us was American isolation."

It should be obvious, the secretary stated heatedly, that "domination of Europe by the United States was the furthest thing from anybody's mind."

"Only by creating some common purpose in the Atlantic world would the American people believe that the present structure of defense should be maintained," he said.

"we are not proposing this linkage as a form of blackmail," the secretary said.

Instead of reacting to this by quickly negotiating a new set of principles, Kissinger said Europe has responded by turning the situation "into a jurisdictional, doctrinal, legalistic dispute."

He indicated this type of thinking could increase an already evident evolution toward new isolationism in the Unted States. Kissinger added that the solution in the U.S. view is up to the Europeans.

He also pointedly criticized some European nations for casting the dispute in terms of hostility toward the United States. He declined to name those coutnries.

Kissinger covered these other points in his 45-minute news conference:

-The constant fighting between Israel and Syria on the Golan Heights is part of trend evident "prior to the final settlement". Other officials likened the situation to that just before the Israel-Egyptian military disengagement.

Kissinger added that the Soviet Union is not responsible for the Syrian artillery barrages against Israeli positions.

-Any move toward better relations with Cuba will have to come from a modification of Havana's policy.

Search begins for Wounded Knee tapes

ST. PAUL, Minn. (AP) - Defense attorneys probing for illegal wiretapping by the FBI sought clues yesterday from tapes made during early stages of the occupation of Wounded Knee, S.D.

Joseph H. Trimbach, special agent in charge of the Minneapolis FBI office, said sich tapes may exist. Or, he added, the tapes used to monitor conversations at a road block could have been erased as a routine procedure so the tapes could be used again.

Trimbach was to pursue the matter with one of his aides during a recess of the special hearing which was delayed the trial.

Mark Lane and five other defense lawyers seek dismissal for alleged illegal government wiretapping and "misconduct" in presenting the case.

U.S. Distric Judge Fred Nichol set aside a second week for the wiertapping hearing with the jury excused.

Six days after some 200 Indians occupied the village, the government installed the phone at the Wounded Knee Trading Post. Prosecution attorneys say this was at the request of AIM leaders and was intended to facilitate contact between Indians and government negotiators.

Nixon rating drops to 25%

PRINCETON, N.J. (AP) - President Nixon's popularity has dropped to an all-time low, with only 25 per cent approving of the way he's doing his job, according to the latest Gallup Poll.

The poll indicated that 64 per cent of the public disapproves of the way Nixon is handling his duties as president. Eleven per cent said they were undecided.

According to Gallup, Nixon's latest rating was 2 per cent higher than the lowest rating given to any president since the surveys were initiated during the second term of President Franklin D. Roosevelt. That rating of 23 per cent went to President Harry S. Truman in November 1951 shortly after a breakdown in truce talks during the Korean War.

Food and gas fuel inflation

WASHINGTON (AP) - Surging food costs led by the biggest jump in beef prices in 27 years drove the cost of living up 1.3 per cent in February as the nation remained in the grip of the worst inflation since the 1940's.

The Labor Department said yesterday that February's increase pushed consumer prices 10 per cent higher than a year ago, producing the first double-digit inflation since a 10.2 per cent rise in the 12 months ending January 1948.

At the same time, purchasing power of American workers declined for the fifth straight month.

Food accounted for nearly half the rise in retail prices last month, with beef up 7.5 per cent, the most in any month since a rise of 9.4 per cent in June 1947. About 20 per cent of the increase was caused by higher prices for gasoline and other energy items.

If the rise in the cost of living continued at last months rate throughout the year, the nation would wind up with a 15.6 per cent inflation rate in 1974. Last year, consumer prices rose 8.8 per cent.

The Consumer Price Index now has risen to 141.5, meaning that it cost $141.50 to buy the same amount of retail goods and services that $100 purchased in the 1967 base period.

The Nixon administration has forecast that the inflation rate will slow down in the last half of the year.

Chairman Herbert Stein of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, cautioned, however, that even after the "temporary surge of food and fuel prices" has passed, inflation will continue to be a serious problem.

The Agriculture Department has forecast record crops of wheat and corn this year, but the full impact of these crops is not expected to reach consumers for several months.

They are expected, however, to lead to a boost in livestook production through mid-1975. Meantime, cattle producers, faced with continued high grain price, are cutting down their shipments of cattle to market, thus driving up prices.

On the wage side, real spendable earnings of workers dropped six-tenths of one per cent since January because of the rise in consumer prices. Over the past year, they have fallen 4.5 per cent, the largest annual decline since the government began keeping these statistics in 1964.

Real spendable earnings is the amount workers take home after deduction for taxes and the effects of inflation.

The 1.3 per cent rise in consumer prices last month, the same both seasonally and unadjusted was the second biggest monthly jumps since February 1951 and was exceeded only the the 1.9 per cent increase recorded last August following the lifting of the administration's price freeze.

Food prices rose 2.5 per cent last month, while non-food commodities increased 1 per cent.

The increase in non-food commodities was traceable to a continued rise in fuel prices, with gasoline and motor oil up 5.3 per cent to a level 30.9 per cent above a year ago.

Gov't spent $17 million on Nixon's homes

WASHINGTON (AP) — A draft report concluding that the government has spent $17 million on President Nixon's homes, including some funds not requested by the Secret Service, was approved by a House subcommittee yesterday on a straight party-line vote.

Brief highlights of the report were given by chairman Jack Brooks, D-Tex., in a statement issued before his House Government Operations subcommittee approved the report.

Republicans strongly objected to the findings and said they had not even known a report was being prepared by the staff until last Monday.

"You include findings and conclusions with which I totally disagree and for which I know of no foundation of facts of the hearings," Rep. John Buchanan, R-Ala., ranking Republican on the subcommittee, told Brooks.

Brooks said the $17 million included the $10 million for security and military costs previously reported for the President's homes plus $7 million in salaries for federal employes at or associated with the homes.

Percy starts '76 campaign

WASHINGTON (AP) — Sen. Charles H. Percy, R-Ill., has raised $135,000 so far to finance his exploration of prospects for a full-blown presidential bid in 1976.

One of the largest contributors, besides the senator himself who has given $5,000 is his daughter, Sharon Percy Rockefeller, who contributed $3,500.

Mrs. Rockefeller is the wife of John D. Rockefeller III, former West Virginia secretary of state and unsuccessful Domocratic gubernatorial candidate in 1972.

Percy is the only Republican with announced presidential ambitions who has filed public financial reports with the GAO.

Technically, he doesn't have to because federal law requires reports only from individuals or contributors who expect to spend money to influence a nomination or election and Percy says he is just exploring.

Nixon revokes permission

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Nixon yesterday remoked permission for the Agriculture Department to inspect income tax returns of farmers as part of its statistics-gathering operations.

Nixon had granted such authority, a subject of controversy in the farm belt, in January 1973.

In announcing the revocation, Deputy White House Press Secretary Gerald L. Warren said the epartment never actually got around to looking at the tax returns of any farmers.

The White House spokesman said Nixon revoked tax-inspection permission on the recommendation of Vice President Gerald R. Ford. The President had instructed Ford to look into the matter at the initial meeting last month of the new Domestic Council Committee on Privacy.

Virgin Mary is 'New Woman'

NEW YORK (AP) - Pope Paul VI said Thursday that modern women, seeking liberation and a share in decision-making power, can find a champion in the Virgin Mary, the mother of Jesus, the "New Woman."

Contrary to some past impressions, he said, she "can be considered a mirror of the expectations of men and women of our times."

In a major new exposition of her role, issued simultaneously by the U.S. Catholic Conference and at the Vatican, the Pope said:

"The modern woman will note with pleasant surprise that Mary of Nazareth, while completely devoted to the will of God, was far from being a timidly submissive woman or one whose piety was repellent to others.

"On the contrary, she was a woman who did not hesitate to proclaim that God vindicates the humble and the oppressed, and removes the 4 powerful people of this world from their privileged positions."

He said she was a woman of strength whose example supports the "liberating energies" now moving in society.

The 17,000-word apostolic exhortation, entitled Marialis Cultus, said the incomplete, one sided picture of Mary that has been given by a "certain type of devotional literature" was hard to reconcile with modern life.

Man charged with attempted murder of Princess Anne

LONDON (AP) - Unemployed Englishman Ian Ball was charged yesterday with attempted murder during an abortive attempt to kidnap Princess Anne near Buckingham Palace. The government ordered tighter security for the royal family.

Four persons were wounded in the shooting 150 yards from the palace Wednesday night. Anne, 23-year-old daughter of Queen Elizabeth II, and her husband, cavalry Capt. Mark Phillips, were unhurt.

"There is no present indication that this was other than an isolated act by an individual," Home Secretary Roy Jenkins told the House of Commons. But he ordered security arrangements for the royal family and other prominent persons tightened.

Ball, 26, made a 60-second appearance at London's Bow Street Court and was ordered held for a week while police continued their investigation of the first attack on British royaltysince 1939.

Police informants said they were trying to discover the source of a large sum of money in Ball's possession.

They were seeking Balls associates and relatives in a bid to discover more about his recent activities.

Ball, tall, lean and neatly bearded, was handcuffed to two detectives during his brief appearance in the dock.

He was specifically charged with the attempted murder of Anne's bodyguard, Inspector James Beaton.

Ball made no statement in court beyond asking for legal aid-the assistance of a court-appointed defense attorney.

A typewritten ransom note reported to demand $4.8 million from the queen was found in the white Ford sedan which cut off the royal car as it returned Anne and her husband to the palace from a downtown charity movie.

A man leaped out firing a flurry of shots at Anne's limousine.

The chauffeur and the police bodyguard were seriously wounded. A policeman who also was hit.

Kissinger: Arabs won't reimpose embargo

WASHINGTON (AP) - Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger today said he does not expect the Arabs to reimpose their oil embargo against the United States and that he does not hold the Soviet Union responsible for the outbreaks of fighting between Israel and Syria in the Golan Heights.

At a news conference in advance of a trip to Moscow, Kissinger said, "Both of us have an obligation to contribute to peace and both of us are exchanging ideas on this subject."

Most of the Arab oil counttries announced last Monday in Vienna that they would lift the embargo against shipments that they had imposed during the Middle East War because of U.S. support for Israel.

Kissinger said it was his understanding that the embargo could be reimposed only by unanimous vote and that he did not consider such a reversal likely. Arab oil ministers are scheduled to meet in Cairo on June 1 to review the situation.

Few stations to stay open Sunday

BOSTON (AP) - A survey of approximately 375 gasoline stations throughout New England revealed no rush to stay open this Sunday, the New England clubs of the American Automobile Association said.

Despite President Nixon's lifting of the ban on Sunday gasoline sales, the AAA said its survey-taken Thursday-showed that only 15 per cent of the stations contacted planned to be open this Sunday.

The association said, however, that a survey showed that most independent gasoline stations in the Boston area are open Sundays.

The AAA said it also found that more stations are pumping gasoline all day on weekdays some are selling gasoline during the evenings.

The association said nearly all stations surveyed in New Hampshire and Maine are selling gasoline all day, compared with approximately half the stations last week.

The AAA said gasoline is sold 24 hours a day, seven days a week on the Maine Turnpike.

Companies file to build gas pipeline

By STAN BENJAMIN
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) — A group of 27 U.S. and Canadian companies filed applications yesterday for permission to build a $5.7-billion, 2,600-mile pipeline to carry natural gas from Arctic Alaska and Canada to the "lower 48" United States.

Alaskan Arctic Gas Pipeline Co., representing the consortium in the United States, filed applications with the Federal Power Commission here.

Additional applications were to be filed with the Interior Department later, and a related organization called Canadian Arctic Gas Pipeline Limited was to file applications with Canada's National Energy Board and other Canadian authorities.

The giant pipeline project, if approved, would become an essential companion to the planned trans-Alaska oil pipeline which was granted federal permits last Jan. 23, after almost four years of environmental controversy.

The Arctic Gas proposal faces some stiff opposition from El Paso Natural Gas Co., which plans to file application later this year to build a natural gas pipeline from the Alaska to a port in the south central part of the state.

From there, El Paso proposes to liquefy the gas and ship it in refrigerated tankers to the U.S. West Coast for regasification. El Paso estimates its proposal would cost $3 billion.

The Arctic Gas proposal could stir more environmental opposition, especially since it calls for construction across part of the U.S. Arctic National Wildlife Range. The proposed El Paso pipeline would follow roughly the route of the already approved oil pipeline.

But the Arctic Gas Pipeline Co. would rather switch than fight. The company said in its application that it would reroute the pipeline to avoid the wildlife refuge, adding 45 miles at an estimated $525 million additional cost to the project, if its preferred route is rejected.

When completed, the application said, the pipeline - four feet in diameter - could transport up to 2.25-billion cubic feet of natural gas daily.

The project calls for collecting natural gas from fields both at Prudhoe Bay on Alaska's North Slope and at the MacKenzie River Delta in northern Canada.

Onassis proposes Louisiana refinery

CONCORD, N.H. (AP - After offering New Hampshire and Rhode Island a multi-million dollar oil refinery, Aristotle Onassis now is making the same proposal to Louisiana.

In a telephone interview from New York, Louisiana Gov. Edwin Edwards said he had held tentative discussions with Onassis agents and would meet again next week.

"He doesn't want to run into the same political problems as he did in New Hampshire," Edwards said, adding that he offered Olympic Refineries, Inc., a "general welcome" to build the refinery between Baton Rouge and New Orleans along the Mississippi River.

Onassis suffered a setback in New Hampshire two weeks ago when the citizens of Durham and the state legislature rejected his proposal to build a $600 million refinery in the University of New Hampshire community.

Since then, the nearby communities of Rochester and Newmarket have shown an interest in the proposal. Newmarket voters will decide on April 16 whether they want a refinery.

Meantime, Gibbs Oil Co. of Revere, Mass., denied a report it was considering Rochester as a potential refinery site.

A company spokesman said the firm is concentrating on its efforts to build a refinery at Sanford, Maine.

U.S. has mild winter

WASHINGTON (AP) - yesterday, the first full day of spring, the National Weather Service lookes back over the winter and said that, averaged for the nation as a whole, it was "considerably milder than normal."

"And that was very fortunate in terms of the heating oil situaion," it said.

The Federal Energy Office concurs. FEO says in its latest report, for the week ended March 8, that the winterhas been about 10 per cent warmer than normal and that heating oil inventories are 32 million barrels higher than a year ago.

Cites "harassment" of artists

Boston theater chain shuns Bolshoi Ballet Co.

BOSTON (AP) - The Sack Theaters said yesterday it will not make its facilities available to Russia's Bolshoi Ballet Company so long as the Soviet Union continues "harassment and repression" of artists.

The apparent first effect of the decision will be on the Boston University Celebrity Series, which wanted to use Sack's Music Hall Theatre for the opening of the Bolshoi's national tour Aug. 13.

Walter Pierce of the university series said the Bolshoi is scheduled to perform in Boston Aug. 13, 14 and 15, and the series asked to use the Music Hall, where it generally presents ballets.

There are 23 Sack Theaters in downtown Boston and its suburbs. The Music Hall is the only one usually used for either live stage shows or films.

Benjamin Sack, president of the theaters, said he sent a telegram to Pierce, saying: "Supervening humanitarian and ethical principles impel Sack Theatres refuse to make Boston Music Hall available Bolshoi Ballet Tour August 1974. 'Administrative measures' our response intolerable Russian restrictions Panovs. No detent with dentention."

The Panovs are husband and wife ballet dancers who want to emigrant from Russian to Israel.

"There's still a lot of time, and I'm hoping maybe the Panov thing will settle itself fairly soon, and we'll be able to use the Music Hall," Pierce said yesterday.

He said he did not plan to take any action immediately and "If we have to, we'll probably go to another hall, if we can," he said. "I just got the wire today. There's a lot of time until August," he said and added he was hoping the Panov situation would be settled by then.

Sack, in a letter to newsmen, said his firm "states for the international record that it will not make available its facilities to the Bolshoi Ballet Company of the Soviet Union so long as the Soviet authorities persist in their inhuman and continual harassment and repression of Valery and Galina Panov and untold numbers of other gifted artists who only wish to spread their talents to the world in the name of their own country.

"Sack Theatres hopes that its position will make it clear to the Soviet government that there will be no personal or artistic detention sanctioned by American theatrical interests."

Around New England

Boston Ed. gripes

BOSTON (AP) - The Boston Edison Company is blaming officials of the Atomic Energy Commission for an extended delay in the opening of the company's nuclear generating plant in Plymouth.

In a telegram to the Federal Energy Office and the Federal Power Commission, Edison says its 670,000-kilowatt nuclear Pilgrim Station is ready to return to service, but an AEC official is causing the delay.

In the telegram, sent Wednesday, the company says the delay in opening the plant will cause fuel replacement charges of $9 million per month. It also says the sutdown is forcing the New England region to use 800,000 barrels of oil per month more than necessary.

Racial balance law

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) - Enough House votes exist to override a gubernatorial veto of any bill aimed at repealing or weakening the state racial balance law, according to Rep. Peter H. Lappin, D-Springfield.

Lappin said he counts four votes more than would be required to override Gov. Francis W. Sargent, should Sargent veto such a bill as he did last year. Last year's veto was upheld.

Lappin is a co-sponsor of eight bills that would amend the controversial 1965 law.

He made the comment at a meeting called Wednesday to play a turnout of busing opponents at legislative hearings next month on this year's balance bills. Sargent said earlier this week here that he would oppose attempts to abandon the racial balance law.

MBTA delays change

BOSTON (AP) - The Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority has postponed the effective date of its spring timetable by one week.

The new schedules will go into effect Saturday, March 30, not March 23 as originally planned, an MBTA spokesman said yesterday.

The schedule change was postponed to give MBTA management and the Carmen's Union time to receive a decision on a contract arbitration, the spokesman said.

Higher Ed. grant

WASHINGTON (AP) - The National Science Foundation has awarded a grant of $368,200 to the New England Board of Higher Education in Wellesley, Mass., to support further development of the Northeast Academic Science Information Center.

When fully operative, the center will be a regional distribution points linked with several national science information centers and academic libraries.

The latest grant has brought the total to $723,700 in foundation funds earmarked for the three-year project, now in its second year. An additional $80,000 award is planned for the start of the new fiscal year, the foundation said.

Colleges for ROTC

BRUNSWICK, Maine (AP) - five southern Maine colleges have announced support of cross enrollment in their ROTC programs.

Under the plan endorsed recently by representatives of the five schools, Bowdoin College's ROTC program would be open to students from the other four institutions.

The other schools participating in the program are Nasson College, St. Joseph's College, the University of Maine at Portland-Gorham and Bates College.

Sargent to veto repeal of law school

BOSTON (AP) - Charging that Massachusetts has "one of the lowest standards of police training of any urban, industrialized state in the country," Gov. Francis W. Sargent said yesterday that he will veto a bill to repeal the law creating a state Criminal Justice Training Council.

"I will fight with all the resources at my command to ensure that veto is upheld" by the legislature, Sargent said in a speech at the Suffolk University Law School.

Legislation creating the council, approved by the legislature last year, didn't take effect until March 11. The House and Senate, meaawhile, passed a bill to repeal the council, which is to be financed by surcharges added to fines levied against persons convicted of crimes.

The council, Sargent said, is to set the standards for criminal justice training.

"In the first year alone," Sargent said, "this program will allow us to spend an additional $4 million on the training of policemen, court personnel and correctional officers...

"I do not propose to let the legislature bring to a halt such a promising effort."

Food prices up in Feb.

BOSTON (AP) - Retail food prices in the Boston area averaged 2.3 per cent higher in February than January, according to statistics released by the federal Department of Labor.

The Boston food index was 20.1 per cent higher than in February, 1973, the department said yesterday.

Increases were noted in all of the five major food-at-home categories. Fruits and vegetables led the month's advance, increasing 4.5 per cent since January.

"We've tried the serious approach and every other approach. Why not a kooky approach," said Selectman Earl F. Kelley.

Moe, Larry, Curly & Nader

By NATHAN GORENSTEIN

With the New York Times complaining about the national hero shortage I can assure them from my vantage point in Amherst that if there are no heroes there is at least one demi-god.

Ralph Nader.

The qualities of a demi-god are wraith-like. He must be famous, but with a fame not of his own making. He must be modest and rely on his deeds to bring him to the forefront of men and events, not on his press secretary or the ad agency with their retainers and percentages of the gross. He can't be too smooth either, or too handsome. You're not supposed to want to ball a demi-god, only worship.

But a demi-god has to publicize. The question, how to publicize and still stay a half-inch above the crowd is a ticklish one, solved by simply assuming one is a demi-god. Just tell them you're coming.

For example, "Nader Speaks." Now who else on the face of the earth could get away with a poster announcing "speaks." Everyone else is obliged to make sense, or at least give the folks some excuse for killing an hour on seats too small except for the thinnest ass in a hall whose acoustics went out with the lion shows at the Coliseum.

Not Nader. His honesty, integrity and righteousness is so clear as to be given with the solemnity of a sacrifice, while everyone else has to buy their time. How about an hour of "Nixon Speaks?" The only people who would show up would be Hugh Scott so he could issue a press release afterwards remarking on the "sustenance given both the Republican Party and the nation," and two New York Times reporters from the "newspaper of record" that even prints English soccer scores.

For an hour of "Sam Ervin Speaks" you'd get the entire 1970 NYU graduating class still looking for the "liberal alternative," one reporter from the one man Boston Globe New York bureau who'll make the speech into Moses' second coming and 10 transplanted bible-belt red-necks.

The list is endless. "Brown Speaks." Either Helen Gurley or Pat. "Hefner Speaks." He'd get an audience. All the Springfield lechers hoping to figure out what the stars next to the "P" mean. Then again we could try "Scoop Speaks," making it either Henry Jackson or Pete Rodino.

Of course there are a few others who would get a crowd on a "Speaks" platform. "Graham Speaks," (Billy) would get a crowd, but one doubts whether or not he qualifies, for despite being a self-acclaimed demi-god (a disqualification) he's related to the one son. Of course, being smooth is yet another disqualification. The Pope hangs in there too, but no doubt gains by lacking the "smooth" disqualification.

At UMass though there is only one other who could even approach the real demi-god's sanctity. Plant some signs around campus reading "Howard Speaks" (as in Moe) and you'll catch the drift.

One must realize, however, that demi-gods require support. In the "Nader Speaks" case it's the two dollar check off on the semester bill, with "Howard Speaks" penance is a half-hour in front of the tv every afternoon at 4 p.m.

But beware. Inflation is rampant and even demigods and their pretenders must eventually sway to the lyres of the economic priests. The price is rising. Let us prepare. I'll build the alter, you bring the lamb.

Zoo Mass

By BILL PARENT

Last Friday while the weather was warm and I had a few Theta Chi beers in me I decided it was time to get away from UMass and Southwest for a while. I hitched north up Route 2 to see some friends at Williams College.

Williams is a granite and ivy structure lying deep in the Berkshires, and though it's only forty five minutes away as soon as I got there I realized I was in another world entirely. The students there are pretty much a sophisticated elite and unlike their Amherst rivals they are secluded from the college life around them. It did'nt take me long to start making comparisons between the people I saw there and the people here at UMass. There were times when I could'nt believe the contrast between that $5000 annually, small, private school and this huge, inexpensive state college.

The main difference I found was in the attitudes and expectations of the Williams student. The image was really quite different than anything I had been used to seeing. At Williams the social life is deeply integrated with the academic. Students can be seen studying on a weekend night and the conversation arount The Log (Williams' Bluewall-with a bit of class) is often of politics and economics. During the weekend I shared food or drink with faculty members on three occasions, the relationship between students and teachers is much more open and stimulating.

However many of the people I met asked me that same old, moldy question: "Do you go to that zoo?". I would only smile and let them tell me their own favorite stories of hedonist escapades in Amherst.

As I was coming home, walking through the Campus Center, I thought about the idea that I had of Williams and about their idea of UMass. I thought about it as I passed the cigarette paper machines and the prophylactic dispenser. I thought about it as I saw a leftover Collegian open to Zamir Nestlebaums' column on being a Pre-Derilict Major. I thought about how they are planning to put another Bluewall in Southwest and yet have never thought of a quiet study area. But then I remembered the two books I had to read this week, and the paper I had due and how my roommate has been having chemistry conniptions' for the past month.

"It's only a false image they see of Umass." I said to myself looking out over Southwest. Just then my door opened and a guy from down the hall burst into the room. "You missed it Bill," he panted. "You should have seen the two-----babes we picked up at the Blue Wall last Saturday night....

Letters to the editor

Sargent invited to UMass

The following letter was sent to Governor Sargent, we reprint it here.

Dear Governor Sargent:

I would like to take this opportunity to extend an invitation to you to the showing of WTIC's award winning documentary by John Sablon and Brad Davis. "Nine Year Old in Norfolk Prison" (1973 Alfred I. Dupont — Columbia Award for outstanding accomplishments in broadcast journalism). Knowing your deep concern for Massachusetts' mentally retarded citizens I felt that this program would be of interest to you.

The program will take place on April 3, 8 p.m. at Mahar Auditorium, University of Massachusetts, Amherst. An answer to this invitation would be appreciated.

William H. Smith

Write to Gov. Sargent

To The Editor:

There is currently a letter campaign being conducted concerning the Russel Daniels case. There will be a table at the Campus Center Concourse with copies of the following letter to the governor. We ask your support for this campaign -- just take the time to place your signatures on a letter.

Dear Governor Sargent:

As a Massachusetts resident who is concerned about the rights and quality of services offered to our mentally retarded citizens I was appalled to learn of the Russell Daniels case ("A Nine Year Old in Norfolk Prison"). From the information available to me, you were asked over a year ago to "appoint a citizens commission to thoroughly investigate the events leading to Mr. Daniels tragedy." I find it shocking that you have not taken action. I strongly urge that you now respond to the above request.

A citizens review commission must investigate the Springfield police and action must be taken following the review. The Department of Mental Health bureaucracy must be held accountable for the services that they exist to provide, and that were obviously not abailable to Mr. Daniels, and in all likelihood, to many other mentally retarded citizens. I also urge that, in this election year, you consider the issue of a criminal justice system that would incarcerate a nine year old boy (in a 28 year old body) in an adult correctional facility.

It is not unfortunate that our government agencies are so unable (or unwilling?) to fulfill their obligations to citizens such as Mr. Daniels? Is it not regrettable that there is such a great need for concerned residents to act as advocates for the rights and needs of those of our fellow Massachusetts citizens who are presently unable to do so for themselves?

Sincerely yours,
how about your name here?
Susan Sherry

Daniels plight disgusting

To The Editor:

It was with shock and disgust that I learned of the plight of Russell Daniels. I had at one time thought that Massachusetts was a leader of sorts in the area of Human Development until I learned that its court system could somehow incarcerate an innocent 28 year old man, with the mentality of a nine-year old, in a maximum security prison.

Something is rotten in Massachusetts and it isn't Cod Fish!

Ted Smith

Boltwood vol mad at S.G.A.

To The Editor:

As an irate Mount Holyoke student and a Boltwood-Belchertown volunteer, I would like to express my dismay at the UMass Student Senate's decision to cut off the funding for the Boltwood program next year. It would appear that the senate did not view the program as a valuable asset for the student population.

I strongly disagree with that judgment, since I have seen how the program has benefited both the residents of Belchertown State School and the student volunteers. Although the majority of the UMass student population may wish to forget the harsh reality of such institutions, over 300 students are concerned and give generously of their time and creativity by volunteering every week. It is ironic that the same "concerned" students who are interested in the fate of Russel Daniels, condemn a social service program that is attempting to better the calibre of live in their state.

The advantages of the Boltwood program are numerous. It exposes UMass students to institutional living and to the people that make up the institution. They learn how to relate to the mentally retarded in an atmosphere that is informal, relaxed, often one-to-one and free of the intellectual self-righteousness that too often entraps students. Students are forced to draw upon valuable resources that may never evolve in a dorm or classroom situation — warmth, compassion, sensitivity, creativity, patience, etc. They may discover that the feeling of helping someone is new and refreshing. The students of today are the one group in this nation who will be primarily influential in determining whether institutions of this type will be perpetuated; and without the volunteer programs while in college, most students would never experience an institution. The Boltwood-Belchertown program should be continued to aid the residents, students and the community in general. If the program was not satisfying for the student volunteers, it would have folded-up long before the Senate offered its assistance.

Elizabeth Eckert

JS Dept. must improve

To The Editor:

I find it unfortunate that the Journalistic Studies Department is the victim of "confusion and Dissent". I hope that the professors in the department realize that faculty unrest does a great deal for student confidence in the program.

More and more students are becoming interested in this area, and the University's department, in my opinion, is very poor. There is not a very wide variety of course choices, and therefore no guarantee that a student will get a spot in the course of his choice. I am a Journalism major, and was unable to get into a Journalism course this semester. There doesn't seem to be many alternatives other than apprenticing somewhere and "learning bad habits from bad newspapers".

Whether it is lack of funds, lack of organization, or personality problems within the department, I feel that the University should try to offer students a better Journalistic Studies program.

Racism debate invited

To The Editor:

Is the accusatory rhetoric by some members of the black community itself a form of racism?

I pose this simple question to the University community for debate - if they care to.

Commie Kissinger

A lot of people will feel disturbed by the following statement: The political and diplomatic activity of Henry Kissenger has been totally centered around merging the United States with Soviet Russia, Red China and the rest of the world into a communist dominated empire, run by the likes of Henry Kissenger and his pals, the Rockefellers. It's true.

Kissinger pulls no punches about associating with the communists. In fact, Frank Capell reports in the March 20 edition of "The Review of the News" that as far back as 1945, Kissinger worked for ODRA, a Soviet Intelligence group that worked underground in Poland with the KGB. Capell's source of information is a former KGB General who has defected to the United States. To protect him, Capell could not reveal his name.

In 1968, Nixon appointed Kissinger as his National Security Advisor. It was under this title that he arranged for the false peace in Vietnam (the war is still going on), and Nixon's New World Order trips to Russia and China. Kissinger took this job when he was a staff member of the Council on Foreign Relations, a Rockefeller-run organization dedicated to bringing about the merger mentioned in the first paragraph.

In recent months, though, Henry did two things as the Secretary of State that clearly show that his sympathies lay with the communists. First, he appointed David Popper as our ambassador to Chile. Second, he appointed Leonard Unger as our ambassador to Free China. Both have long time connections with communist and communist-front organizations. Both are dangerous security risks. And Kissinger's appointing them as ambassadors to countries that are strongly anti-communist shows that he himself is either a communist or an anti-anti-communist.

Before his death in 1924, Lenin stated the Soviet plan for conquest, "First we will take Eastern Europe, then the land masses of Asia. Then we will tackle the last bastion of capitalism, the United States. We will not have to fight. It will fall into our hands like an overripe fruit."

With the help of our State Department, Eastern Europe fell to the communists by 1950. Except for Thailand and South Vietnam, Asia fell by 1954, again with the help of the U.S. State Department. Kissinger is helping the commies take the United States. The fact that so many Americans believe in the United Nations and like Kissinger shows that America is indeed an overripe fruit ready to fall into the hands of the Kremlin bosses. Let me remind you that the doings of the State Department in this was financed by the taxpayers.

A big question exists: Why would Nixon and Kissinger and their predecessors allow this to happen? To me, there is only one answer, that these people have been put there by those who want a one-world government run by them. The finger points to those such as the Rockefellers, Kennedy's, Cyrus Eaton and the Ford's. Kissinger and Nixon are their agents. And this is why Henry Kissinger should be considered a dangerous man.

History recalls that during the Truman Administration, there was a scandal about communists in the State Department. Dwight Eisenhower was elected on a promise to "clean up the mess in Washington." Secretaries of State John Foster Dulles, Dean Rusk, William Rogers and Henry Kissinger have done exactly the opposite. It is safe to say that the State Department is loaded with communists. Henry Kissinger has been the most dangerous of them all. He is selling out the United States to the Kremlin and the communists and their bosses. Kissinger should be made to stop his detente and giveaway policies. Write your congressman and urge him to do whatever he can to rid the world of this diabolical devil.

Nixon's barn

A futuristic trip into the contents of President Nixon's Presidential Library, along with the horrors of two Washington D.C. reporters in the age old struggle of news-gathering.

Hidden in this week's news was the disclosure that President Nixon owns a barn in Kentucky where he is storing artifacts of his Administration. He plans to turn the goods over to the Smithsonian Institute after his term is finished next month or in 1976.

My friend and journalistic confidant Sleepy Thumbtwiddle and I took a trip to Kentucky to investigate this cow palace of memoboralia and here is what we found.

The first item of interest we saw was the chair that Rosemary Woods broke when making her now famous seventeen foot spread that resulted in the eighteen minute gap. Along with the chair was a certified apology sent to the publishers of the Satanic Bible, who violently protested the devil theory that was made testimony by the Watergate Committee. Also found was a pair of Ms. Woods shoes, size twenty-two triple E, which gave the advantage in making her reach for destiny.

Another piece of furniture, a piano was discovered. Much to our amazement we discovered it to be a player piano. Several player roles including, "God Bless America", Turkey in the Straw, The Smith College Anthem, and the 'I Like Ike Rag Were Found." We also found a few copies of "Never Gonna Give You Up", a song that most insiders know the President sings to the seal of the President everytime Pete Rodino calls for a chorus.

A box of books instruction on the fine art of yo-yoing was discovered. Apparently President Nixon bought them to avoid anymore humiliation such as he did when he showed the world his physical dexterity in Nashville Tennessee during a recent visit there.

Several bags of addressed Christmas greetings were found tucked in a corner. They were addressed to John Mitchell, John Dean, H.R. Haldeman, John Ehrlichman and various other pals. We couldn't understand why they were never mailed.

Another unexplainable collection of the President's were some two-hundred thousand advertisements declaring "Ford has a better idea", that somehow passed out of circulation before Madison Avenue gave the nod.

Hanging from the barn's rafters with a noose around his neck was a caricature of John Sirica.

A moth eaten Republican cloth coat, incidentally made in the republic Taiwan, was found on a hanger marked "purloined" from the Watergate Hotel.

Three Martha Mitchell telephones were tied in a knot around the freeze-dried body of Dita Beard.

Also found were some twenty-two thousand milk bottles with an enclosed thank-you note from the Association of American Milk Dealers.

Architectural drawings for Rebozo Acres to be located on some property owned by Robert Vesco along with several numbers of Swiss Bank Accounts were filed under 'P..pals and problems".

A leather bound copy of "The Doctor's Quick Weight Loss Diet," dedicated to John Mitchell was still gift wrapped, apparently undeliverable to Leavenworth. Also a gift edition of Roget's Thesoraus, with a special chapter on illiteration was intended for Spiro Agnew, but never was delivered.

A document entitled, "I Never Enjoyed Massachusetts, Anyway," by Richard Nixon was preserved in plexiglass. It contained sections on being bothered in Boston, clouted in Cambridge, and addled in Amherst along with plans to repay the state with massive unemployment for its contribution to his 1972 mandate.

Forty-two books of MacDonald's gift certificates were unexplainably mixed in with contribution recordings.

Thumbtwiddle and I were finally exhausted by our surreptitious tour of the Nixon barn and decided to leave. As we neared the door, Thumbtwiddle let out an agonizing yell as he fell to the floor.

"Thumbtwiddle, Thumbtwiddle", I yelled, "what happened, did you hurt your back, are you OK?"

"Yes, yes, he came back frowning and in pain."

"What did you slip in I asked?"

I don't know, lets look, he said as he climbed up dusting himself off."

"Oh my God, he cried look at this, look at this. It's a big mushy thing. I hope it isn't what I think it is."

"Calm down now Thumbtwiddle there's a tag identifying this thing." Oh no Thumbtwiddle, this is terrible, you have slipped in the Watergate Mess, the shame of it all."

No easy out

At Wednesday's Senate meeting Tim O'Brien, Head of Central Area Government, submitted a resolution to raise the question of the impeachment of Nick Apostola at the Senate's next meeting on April 3. O'Brien's charges had the backing of all area residence government heads.

The charges which the resident representatives intend to introduce on April 3 range from failure to keep campaign promises to blatant negligence in not attending Area Government meetings. Their main gripe is the action of Apostola in voting for the present parking plans against the expressed wish of the Senate, the representatives of the student body.

Impeachment on any level prior to Watergate was considered a grave undertaking, something to be whispered in your wife's ear after midnight. Now, however, it could be a useful organizational tool. If Nick Apostola is deemed guilty of violating his oath of office, then he should be removed. The President of the Student Government Association does not deserve any more consideration in his formal capacity than would an incompetent burger flipper.

An argument already raised against the impending motion is one of time. The Presidential Campaign is scheduled for April 22. Why don't the opponents of Apostola simply wait two weeks? Expediency should not be a consideration. If student lawmakers shirk their responsibility the WHO is responsible? Can student leaders dictate elaborate budgeting proposals, endorse glorious sounding acts of civil disobedience, and spend hundreds of thousands of dollars a year without seriously looking at basic charges against the highest office in the SGA.

This is not to say that Nick Apostola is guilty of anything, but considering the lack of tangible support for Apostola's position suggest that serious doubts about his effectiveness are widespread. Leadership, even at the low price of $37.50 a week, shouldn't be second rated.

Bob Estelle, Charles Camelopard, Fred Weiss, Joyce Kosofsky, Matt Tackeff, Steve Anderson, Barbara Voorhees, Bill Ballou, Gerry Cataldo, Jerry Lazar, Zamir Nestelbaum have absolutely nothing in common, but they will make you cry, laugh, angry, sad, and generally responsive when you and them return from vacation. Have a good one!

WMUA: racist, irresponsible

To The Editor:

In addressing myself to the front page article in the Collegian (3-20) and the two page center spread on WMUA.

I am stating that there is a clear and present conspiracy in the communication media on this campus. It would seem coincidental, however, while we are looking at racism here at UMass, we should start with the power these organizations have to promote and manifest this monster, racism. Whether it was apparent to all that read the paper or not, WMUA has an all white staff (on the surface). There are three black people however, that produce music shows on WMUA even though their shows are interupted by incompetent news staffers of WMUA. In dealing with the station, I have found the management to be very irresponsive and irresponsive to the third world community's interests.

Of the 240 weekly broadcast hours third world programming can be heard during 12 of these only. Surely the station does not think this great disproportionality in the time alotted as meeting the needs of the third world here at UMass.

I hope that the third world community takes this letter as a forerunner of total black support of Corp. or any group, person, or organization that is willing to take action where action is needed to reverse the oppressive and suppressive atmosphere at UMass.

No strings attached to Ji

To The Editor:

re: Barbara Voorhees

The reason why you haven't heard about Guru Maharaj Ji lately is because we have not been concentrating on informing people about him, but about his meditation (knowledge) that he is offering freely to the world.

You see, many people have misconceptions about this 16 year old boy and the mission that surrounds him. They feel that when you receive Guru Maharej Ji's knowledge there are strings attached. This is not true. All Guru Maharej Ji asks is for people to try this meditation before concluding their investigation. The experience will speak for itself.

Unfortunately, when we talk about this meditative experience, it is difficult not to mention Maharaj Ji because, if it wasn't for him, there wouldn't be any meditative experience. It is like separating Christ from Christmas. You can't do it. The two go hand in hand. They are inseparable. Guru Maharaj Ji is offering an experience of peace within, not a course in austerity. Really, this is all he is doing, but this is so fantastic.

If anyone is interested in finding out more about this meditation, there are weekly informal discussions every Wednesday in room 805 C.C., starting at 7:30. Also this Wednesday there will be a film about Guru Maharaj Ji and his knowledge in room 917 C.C., at the same time. Everyone is welcome to attend.

Make loans, but beware

To The Editor:

For the past few semesters the Student Government Association has been providing a book loan service. Anyone who finds themselves short of money at book buying time can take out an easy loan to meet these expenses.

On the whole this service has been quite a success. Most people who take out loans make repayments promptly. There exists however, a group of some fifty people who have delinquent book loans dating back to September. These people have caused quite a snag in the book loan system through their negligence to repay their loans. Most have been generally uncooperative in replying to requests for repayment.

As Attorney General, I've been instructed by the Senate to deal with this matter. For all intents and purposes, the issue is really out of the hands of both this office and the Senate. The mechanism for dealing with any debt of this nature is Administrative Withdrawal. This procedure amounts to involuntary separation from the University pending payment of the amount due. It is a harsh measure and a real hassle. Trying to get your records back in order afterwards can be a nightmare, as anyone familiar with Whitmore procedure can imagine.

The purpose of this comment is to help you bypass this hassle. By repaying the loan within the next two weeks, you can avoid Administrative Withdrawal. It remains however, the only alternative for those who continue to ignore their commitments.

Jesus: joy, comfort, peace

To The Editor:

Yes, we've seen Jesus. Within the past two years, we've come to know Jesus, and we can now testify that it is He, and only He, that brings joy, comfort, and peace into lives. We saw Jesus at the moment we dedicated our lives to Him; since then, He has not left us. Furthermore, He promises that He never will.

You see, Jesus is our God, the Lord of Israel who died for us over 2,000 years ago. But He defeated death through His Resurrection on the cross, enabling us to continue to fellowship with God, the Father. Also, Jesus never said that we could earn our way to heaven by good morals, great philosophy, or high standards, but He did promise a way in which we could come to know God. The only way is by opening up our hearts and asking Him to come in and be Lord of our lives.

Today, we can sincerely stand before you and share the fact that Jesus did come into our lives! There is no way that we can ever deny the fact that Jesus did what He said He would do.

Now, we have the assurance that God is in control of our lives, and we want to share His great love with you. In doing so, we challenge you to come to grips with the issues Jesus set forth, the issues that He loves us very much and that He died as an atonement for our sins.

There is no way we can just disregard earth's sweetest name, Jesus. For although emperors have tried to destroy it and monarchs have tried to erase it, no power, no man and no kingdom will ever destroy the name we live by.

Senate priorities all wrong

To The Editor:

After witnessing the activities of the Student Senate meeting last Wednesday night, I'm amazed that the student body gives these senators about $800,000 of our money to spend.

The budget committee of the Student Senate has come up with a priority system for allocating funds for the next fiscal year. Their limit of available money is the same as it was during this fiscal year. The budget committee has put all Student Senate funded activities into nine categories, the lower categories receiving less priority over available funds.

I understand, from talking to the head of the budget committee, that the fifth and sixth categories may suffer a somewhat lower budget, while the seventh to nineth groups may experience a more severe budget cutback.

Now please tell me, Mr. Budget Director, how do you evaluate that such a group as the Arab Students Organization have a higher priority than Belchertown, Boltwood, or Northhampton Volunteers? Just because a large group of volunteers such as Boltwood Project, work outside of this campus, is that any reason to give them a possible budget cut, or totally withdraw their funds?

I think many of the Student Senators are forgetting one thing. They are representing the student body. At last Wednesday night's meeting, many senators showed an extreme lack of interest when people were speaking on an issue. When Dr. Ricci spoke to the senate, some people didn't even have the common decency to listen. I counted five times during the first hour of the meeting that the Speaker of the Senate had to ask people to refrain from talking so loud.

I saw people doing their homework during the meeting while others were reading magazines and talking to their friends. When an interesting debate was taking place, a senator would ask for the debate to be discontinued, and the senate didn't have the necessary two-thirds vote to override this request. At one point in the meeting, eight representatives from different area governments called for the resignation of the Student Senate President. The President treated it as a joke, and I wasn't even sure if the representatives were serious with their demand.

I keep asking myself if these are the people that are supposed to be representing the student body. Please don't get me wrong, there are some senators that are really interested and open-minded to their constituents. But what about the other senators...are they really on an ego trip?

Robert Pike

Student Senate unfair to social action

To The Editor:

As volunteers in the Boltwood-Belchertown Project, we are very concerned over the fact that the Student Senate intends to cut the budgets for RSO groups-especially those involved in community affairs.

We realize that the Student Senate is FOR the students, and these proposed budget cuts are supposed to prevent a rise in the fees. This is all well and good, but why are some groups getting cut and others getting increases? We want the facts.

We have been told that Boltwood does not affect a large enough number of students and is therefore a low priority group. Who decides which groups receive a 'low' or 'high' priority label? In addition, according to a Collegian investigator, programs involving students in off-campus community projects would be cut entirely, inevitably killing them.

Approximately three hundred students give their free time to bringing happiness to the ritualistic lives of the residents of Belchertown, who would hardly, if ever, experience outside stimulation from our 'normal' world. This also goes for other social service groups like Northampton Volunteers, J.O.E., and M.A.R.Y. which involve hundreds of other University students.

Full-time employees at the State School have remarked many times that if it had not been for the students' concern and willingness to lend a helping hand, Belchertown State School would not have progressed to where it is today.

The only funding required by the Boltwood-Belchertown volunteers is the cost of three busses to and from the State School two nights a week. Not much to ask considering the joy we bring to the Belchertown residents.

So, please, Student Senate, think of the effect of RSO community groups and give us our minimal funding. We surely would not want to be the ones to have to tell the kids that we cannot come anymore.

Devin Mulhern
Nikki Ruggiero

Priority system unrepresentative

To The Editor:

Listen up out there, 'cause we're playing the game with your money.

We of the Social Action Group would like to protest the inequalities of the forthcoming budgetary procedure for RSO funding of fiscal year 1975. Our complaints are based on the fact that allocation of monies (your student activities tax) requires a value judgement on the priority of RSO groups by a select few. The priority system does not accurately represent the student response to Social Action Groups. Social Action Groups represent the full spectrum of humanity gaining experience through helping disadvantaged people. The University is committed to progressive social action. Therefore students who are demonstrating affirmative action towards alleviating an existing social atrocity should be allowed an equal opportunity for funding. The new budgetary system has sacrificed equal opportunity for funding in order to conceal and insulate the political games the Senate indulges in. If student monies will not be made more available to groups of higher priority — then why are groups placed on a priority totem pole?

What we are trying to say is that if the student interest is in an activity that requires money, then why must we be hampered by a Senate too concerned with conforming to the political practices of a society that produced Watergate, ITT scandal and well you name it. Organization of budget appropriations is needed but why a priority system subject to personal and political biases?

Can't canines be kept from the commons?

To The Editor:

As everyone knows, there are many problems concerning the Dining Commons. The most ridiculous problem happens to be dogs. I would think that from our secondary school education and our homes, that everyone would agree with the fact that dogs and cafeterias don't mix. Yet, there is not one meal that I can sit through without at least one dog coming through the various rooms of the Dining Commons. If everyone knows that it is unsanitary to allow dogs in cafeterias, then why do I see them?

These dogs wander around the Dining Commons, with hungry looks in their eyes and practically begging for food. Most people that I know, like dogs and, if they have something decent left on their plate, will give it to the dog. When they feed the dog, they put the food on a plate and place it on the floor; where the dog licks the plate. This plate is washed later on, in a cafeteria dishwasher and used for another persons food. This is not the most unsanitary action, but it is close to it.

Anyone who has a dog (Had a dog) knows that soon after the dog eats, he should go outside. Well, it isn't that easy for a dog to get outside when everyone is tempting him with food and attention. He naturally doesn't wish to give this up, so he ends up christening the rubber plants, tables, chairs, and if he is really desperate, clothes. This is the most unsanitary action in the Dining Commons.

I am, of course, speaking from experience. Once, while I was eating a decent dinner, talking with my friends, a girl at another table tried to get my attention. When she finally did get it, she told me what had just happened and sure enough, some dog had just christened my jacket. Fortunately, I had worn my ski jacket, which could be thrown in the washing machine. If I had worn my wool coat, I may as well have thrown it out. I was lucky then, but next time, it may be good clothing that will get ruined. In fact, it could be anyone's clothing that will get ruined next time.

The main cause of this problem is that people don't keep dogs out of the Dining Commons. However, when they enter, very few are thrown out again. If someone does throw the dog out, he hangs around until he gets in, which he undoubtedly does. Also, none of the hired help gets rid of them. People are hired to sit at exits to "stop" stealing from the Dining Commons. Why don't they throw the dogs out? They just sit there.

The ONLY sensible solution to this annoying problem is to not allow dogs in the Dining Comons. If they manage to slip by, the people whom the dogs slipped in on, should have the decency to kick them out. Lastly, if that doesn't happen, the people who get paid to sit at an exit to "guard" against stealing should kick the dogs out.

I love dogs, but not when they create an unsanitary atmosphere in the Dining Commons.

New York...A City Of Visual Cliches

by Steve Ruggles

Over the years, New York City has amassed a rather large list of descriptive cliches. While I was in New York for the NIT, I had two and a half days to see the city. This photo essay is a rather small sampling of some of the visual cliches which I feel New York is.

This essay was hard to put on one page...the city has so much emotion, so many stereotyped scenes, so much depression, so much vigor, so much poverty, so much beauty, so much perversion...it all seems so contradictory.

Is this a photo whose background is out of focus of a man, or is it a portrait of a man whose background is out of focus? Is this a photo of a man waiting for a train, or do you think he's waiting for something with alot more meaning? Is this young New Yorker sitting in the subway station because he has no place to sleep, or because he has no place at all? It is all so contradictory!!!

Nader urges Mass. legislature to lead nuclear power dissent

BOSTON (AP) - Consumer advocate Ralph Nader asked the Massachusetts legislature yesterday to lead the other states in opposing development of nuclear power.

"There is beginning a mighty citizen reaction against nuclear power and across the country it will be one of the fiercest consumer issues," Nader told a joint session of both houses.

He called nuclear power "unsafe, unreliable and unnncessary."

Nader said the oil industry had vastly understated domestic petroleum reserves. Reliance on those and a "massive curtailment of energy waste" would mean "a new energy ethic" and no energy crisis, he said.

"Conservation of energy is best done at state and local levels," Nader said.

"The government-industry nuclear power program," said Nader, "constitutes the single greatest safety problem in Massachusetts today."

"The same people who brought us gasoline shortages, natural gas shortages, soaring heating and gasoline prices and the 'energy crisis,' " he charged, "now give us their reliable technical judgment that nuclear power is all right. But the real question is not whether incompetent administration energy planners thinkthat nuclear power plants in Massachusetts neighborhoods are worth the risk. The question is whether the people of Massachusetts want to take that risk."

Nader told the legislators that he has singled out Massachusetts because it "has often served a dual role as the nation's conscience and as a pioneer in progressive social legislation." Massachusetts, he said, "must again exercise its foresight and conscience in meeting our future energy needs."

He urged the lawmakers to enact several proposed bills which would involve state agencies in the siting and regulation of nuclear power plants.

Nader also said that programs of energy conservation and development of alternative sources will make nuclear power unnecessary to fulfill future needs. He criticized promotional activities of the utility industry which, he said, are based on its "economic interest in selling energy."

In other speeches during the week, Nader hit hard at industry plans to build 1000 nuclear plants before the turn of the century. Speaking at the University of Massachusetts in Amherst Monday, Nader said rapid development of nuclear power "could well be the end of the United States as a safe environment."

Gun control group formed to work for legislation

BOSTON (AP) - "I guess the networkds can't show this," the widow said before she picked up a pencil and plunged it through a piece of paper.

"My husband's wound was about this size, and when I saw it, it already had been enlarged for drainage. It killed him and in the process made him blind and deaf and totally nonfunctioning."

"People have to go realize a gun can be a small thing that shoots a small bullet that can be devastating."

Janet Wohlberg, widow of a Boston State Hospital psychiatrist who was shot and killed by a patient earlier this year, was explaining for a news conference yesterday her involvement in a new gun control organization, People vs. Handguns.

Organizers of the group said they will work to put on the November ballot an initiative proposition to ban private possession of pistols if the legislature does not ban them.

The legislature takes up gun control bills next week. Only one, outlawing handguns with barrels of less then 3 inches, has a favorable committee report.

Sheriff John J. Buckley of Middlesex County called that bill meaningless. Buckley said he believes he has "great public support" but added "We realize what we are up against."

Masked pie thrower strikes

By TONY GRANITE
MDC Columnist

PIE ON THE FLY...happens at USoFla. It was reported in The Oracle that a masked man approached President Cecil Mackey as he held an open-air "Hotline" session and threw a chocolate meringue pie in his face. An Oracle cameramen was on hand to record the event for a page one report in the Feb. 19 edition of the student daily.

Dr. Mackey didn't think it was at all funny. His only comment following the incident was that it was "a shame that the thrower had to waste the pie" on him. The president-elect of Student Government said the incident typified "people's contempt for Mackey." The Oracle photog revealed he had been tipped off to the "really good photo" by a "tall, bearded, dark-haired man" whom he could not identify.

Resulting coverage of the incident elicited these headlines over editorials and letters to the editor: "Some have indigestion, others want more pie"; "Next pie for Nixon" "Pie damaged USF's image"; and "Oracle actions show 'yellow journalism' " in a letter that reminded the photographer that he was "an accessory before the fact of a lawless act of assault and battery. It's also possible if two or more perpetrators were involved, the incident my be considered a conspiracy."

Shoo, don't fly pie. Eat it.

ADD POWER OF THE CAMPUS PRESS...the ad read, "Wanted and desperately needed: Husbands for four senior girls who have only 15 more weeks to hook one, since that's what we're here for."

Some 50 phone calls later, the Central Michigan U. coeds admitted it was all "a joke." In an interview with the CMU Life, they said they had been offended by male chauvinist remarks like "She only wants her MRS degree," or "She's only in college to catch a husband."

But the girls have promised the matchmaking campus press that it will be the first to know if any of them does marry someone who answered the ad.

Seems only fair.

Maple syrup business remains prosperous

NORTH GRANVILLE, N.Y. (AP) - Business remains steady at William Rathbun's neat, red sugar house, despite rising maple syrup prices and the gasoline shortage.

"People have spent more money per person, but we've had fewer people this year," said Rathbun, one of New York State's largest producers. "I think people are buying for friends."

Rathbun, a ruddy-cheeked upstate New York native, expects to draw 3,500 customers to his sugar house on the Vermont border during March and early April. He says they'll come from as far away as Burlington and Rutland in Vermont, and Albany and Saratoga Springs in New York State.

Rathbun, 36, says he has increased prices a dollar a gallon each of the last three years to help cover rising costs. He is charging $9.95 a gallon for the sweet, heavy syrup this season, and hopes to produce 1,500 gallons. He estimates his 1,400-gallon production last season make him about the tenth largest producer in the state.

"I think if someone wants it, he'll pay for it." said Rathbun, a town justice and former dairy farmer who runs a landscaping business the rest of the year.

He predicts his biggest production problem this season will be fickle weather, rather than fuel.

"We haven't had a big run this year," he said. "We don't seem to be getting the sunshine we need."

Arrest controls

A bill regulating police search of arrested individuals has been drafted by two University of Massachusetts-Amherst legal studies professors. Current police practice in Massachusetts would be maintained by the State bill, they say.

If passed by the Legislature, the bill would nullify two 1973 Supreme Court decisions which hold that a lawful arrest gives police authority to conduct a full search without a warrant, according to Asst. Prof. Ethan Katsh and Asst. Prof. Stephen Arons. They drafted the bill for State Senator John W. Olver of Amherst.

Senate 194 would allow police search of arrested individuals for only two reasons--evidence of the crime the individual has been arrested for, and weapons which might be used by the individual. It is "designed to maintain, through the use of statute, the benefits of current Massachusetts police practice concerning searches incident to an arrest," Prof Katsh last week told the State Legislature's Joint Committee on the Judiciary. In his testimony, Prof. Katsh cited two 1973 Supreme Court rulings--U.S. versus Robinson and Gustafson versus Florida.

The rulings, he said, "state what is constitutionally permissible in the absence of other statutory controls." The proposed bill, he said, gives police protection against violence by allowing search for weapons, and protects the rights of arrested individuals by allowing only limited search unless police obtain a search warrant. Thus, he said, the courts would maintain their role in protecting the privacy of individuals.

Belchertown play

Simplicity, a newly-formed improvisational theatre group, will present "Jack and the Beanstalk" Thursday, March 28, 7 p.m. at the Infirmary building, Belchertown State School in Belchertown.

The performance is part of Magic Spring Bean, a party for residents of the state school. Featured performers include Michael Cohen, a UMass graduate student; Holly Creel and Lauren Zagoren, UMass special students; and Emily Ridout, area resident.

As part of the activities, individually potted string beans will be planted by residents and friends. At the same time, a shaving cream fight will add to this free-for-all which organizer Cohen says is "simply in the spirit of love--active love."

Anyone who wants to experience first-hand the energy--the pure karma--of the mentally but not emotionally retarded is invited, according to Cohen.

There is no charge for the performance or refreshments.

Radio astronomy

U.S. Rep. Silvio O. Conte (R-Mass.), and Sen. Edward W. Brooke yesterday announced that the National Science Foundation has awarded a $140,000 grant to the University of Massachusetts at Amherst for further development of meter-wave radio astronomy equipment located at the Five College Radio Astronomy Observatory Site at Quabbin Reservation.

Principal investigators are G.R. Huguenin, J.H. Taylor and R.H. Manchester of the Department of Physics and Astronomy.

Chamber concert

On Saturday, March 23rd, the Valley Chamber Players will sponsor an evening of contemporary music by the Performance Workshop - a performance-research group which relies largely on the medium of improvisational and open-form techniques.

The first performance of the Workshop in Amherst will present John Holland's Chamber Concert entitled Music, a ninety-minute work for two. Readers and Instruments based on the "epicurian musical monograph" Music Since 1900 by Nicolas Slomimsky.

The program will be presented in the Old Chapel at the University of Massachusetts - 7:30 P.M.

Admission is free.

UMass chorale

On March 29 the University of Massachusetts Chorale will perform in front of music educators from all over the state in the 1974 MMEA All-State Conference to be held in Hyannis.

The Chorale was selected by audition from collegiate choirs in Massachusetts, and with Boston University will be representing choral work at the college level. Well-known and highly respected in the western Massachusetts area, the Chorale has sung in several previous All-State Festivals.

They have also performed in numerous choral festivals, including the International Choral Festival, held in the Five-College Area two years ago, and the Intercollegiate Choral Festival held at the University of Connecticut last winter.

Register today for women's career study

A Woman's Career Awareness Workshop for undergraduate students is being offered this spring by two staff members of the Student Development Center, Susana Krivatsy and Elizabeth Kennedy. Its purpose is to help women plan the career direction they wish their lives to take. Personal exploration, the expression of individual interests and abilities through activities and discussion, and career goal-setting will be the main focus of the workship series. Interviewing, information on career resources, individual investigation of specific occupations, and resume writing may also be a part of the series, dependent on participants' interests and needs.

The workshop series will begin Monday morning, April 8, 9:30-11:00 a.m., and run for six sessions, through May 13, 1974. You may sign up for tte Woman's Career Awareness Workshop or learn more about it by visiting the Student Development Center, Room 213 Berkshire House.

Your head

Academic pressure, parents may cause anxiety

By DRS. ANDREW W. MCCASHIN AND STEPHEN M. KLEIN
MDC Columnists

Q. I think I'm upset about my school work and worrying a lot about my ability. My parents and teachers have insisted that I had the ability to do well,usually I don't work very hard and sometimes get good grades and sometimes I don't. I've seen myself as not taking school "seriously." Yet now in thinking about he future I am taking more than a casual interest in my courses and not necessarily doing better. Do I need help?

A. Understandably a major source of anxiety for students is academic pressure. Your description suggests that already you have worried about school for "some time" but that discomfort and anxiety has increased recently. Not knowing the details of your situation we can only speculate as to what is causing it. Here are some possibilities. Generally, in our work-oriented, industrialized society schools exert more or less contuous pressure to perform and produce from grade school to college. By contrast developmentally people do not naturally possess a constant orientation to work but rather shift in and out of periods throughout their life-time where work in its various forms is important. For example adolescense is often described as a time of creative search and discovery where questions of sexuality, ideology, identity and separation from one's parents are important. Work in the academic sense feel less relevant during this period. So often during adolescense external demands and pressures are at variance with internal strivings and needs. This creates anxiety.

Parent-son, parent-daughter struggles can create anxiety around school work. Conflicts about who is working for whom and under what conditions are common. A lack of "motivation" on the student's part can sometimes be a direct expression of resentment against what are felt to be unreasonable parental expectations. Sometimes the situation can be more complicated where the student feels "tied up" and unable to get untracked, because he or she is caught in a parental double bind. In this case the student gets two messages, one "strive for success" and another which says "fail". Parents while insisting that their children do well may interfere in such ways as to undermine their son's and daughter's efforts.

Whether or not you need help is up to you. If you want to explore your specific situation an M.H. staff person can provide you that opportunity.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Slow and easy should be your keynote. Foundations are not solid. Look around—test and experiment without committing yourself. Ask questions and hold off on arriving at definite conclusions. You are on brink of good fortune. Avoid premature action.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Friends may be argumentative. Be patient. Avoid becoming involved in foolish disputes. Stick to principles without forgetting concept of golden rule. Sagittarius, Gemini persons figure prominently. You will change your mind about ultimate goal. And this could be all to the good.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): What was apparently settled becomes unglued. There is no reason for panic. What you need you already possess— in abundance. Your natural versatility will resolve apparent dilemma. Do some remodeling, reshaping of opinions. Check priorities.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Be ready for change of scenery. Don't fight progress. Find creative outlet for special abilities. You are offered chance to test ideas. Accept. Gemini, Virgo and Sagittarius persons are in picture. Member of opposite sex pays meaningful compliment.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Pull in reins where spending, budget enter picture. One who does a lot of talking and makes promises may be confused. Know it and diplomatically insist on additional verification. You can afford to wait rather than rush into complicated situation.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Study Leo message for valid hint. Overcome tendency to see persons, situations in idealistic light. Come down to earth—get facts and figures. Avoid self-deception. Refine techniques. Be selective. Realistic approach brings constructive results.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Older individual is sincere but may not have necessary material. Know it; be kind but depend on yourself. Keep resolutions concerning work, recreation and health. Medical or dental appointment could be in picture. Don't put it off!

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Now you can complete project, assignment. Aries, Libra persons are apt to be involved. Lovers' quarrel should not be blown out of proportion. Maintain balance; be willing to laugh at your own foibles. Ignore one who is willing to spend and spend so long as it is your money.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Safety hazard at home should no longer be neglected. Take initiative in making residence more comfortable, harmonious. Leo, Aquarius persons figure prominently. Romantic innerlude plays a role.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Hold off on short trips. Confusion exists regarding appointments messages and calls. Cancer individual displays petulance. Take it in stride. Ride with tide. Gossipy neighbor, associate is merely letting off steam. Don't believe everything you hear.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Money and how it gets that way is the theme of your personal thesis. Someone is playing it loose and easy and you are standing the expense. Area of Solar horoscope dealing with reward and payment is dominated now by illusion. Draw line!

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): One in authority is paying lip service. Know it and protect yourself in clinches. Aquarius, Leo, Scorpio and Taurus persons are in picture. Do some revising. Don't permit pride to block progress. Get accounting.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you were on your own early, separated psychologically or otherwise from parents at relatively tender age. You do not fit in my mold. You are inventive, independent, revolutionary and July will be your most significant month of this year. You are not easy to understand but you are impossible to ignore. Many born under Scorpio are drawn to you and become your allies.

Rights for prostitutes?

BOSTON (AP) - The madam got cold feet.

But the hearing on legalized prostitution went ahead without her at Massachusetts Legislature's Judiciary Committee, ending with an angry interchange between legislators.

Rep. Barney Frank, D-Boston, who had invited the madam, urged that prostitution be brought under zoning laws as light industry.

"Handle it like gas stations," he said. "It doesn't belong in a residential neighborhood, but it's perfectly okay where it doesn't bother anybody."

"Legalized prostitution is less disruptive than illegal prostitution," he said. "It'll put a crimp in the pimp business."

Frank, who is known as Beacon Hill's champion of gay rights, called the bill "my safe issue, politically, Heterosexuality is safer than homosexuality."

Rep. Charles R. Doyle, D-Boston, a member of the committee, apparently did not find it so safe.

"Prostitution is a cancer in our society," he said. "The main reason the Roman empire collapsed was the breakdown of the moral fibre of that era."

"If mature adults want to engage in some form of interpersonal conduct, whether money changes hands or not, it's none of our business," Frank said.

Rowing a year-round sport for UMass' Dad-Vail champs

By RON SCULL

After the crew team came off the water in late October, it began weight-lifting and conditioning work-outs five days each week until finals period, at which time the load was reduced to three sessions. During Christmas, each oarsman followed a prescribed work-out, developed by Coach Mike Vespoli to strengthen individual weaknesses. For the last two weeks of intercession, the varsity oarsmen, along with several dedicated freshmen, trained at the facilities at Boston University.

Returning to campus, the team practiced six days a week, including weightlifting, running, and ergometer work (an ergometer is a device which simulates rowing and measures rowing strength).

Daily Collegian

SPORTS

The crews have been on the water since Feb. 25, the earliest start in the history of the club. Rowing six days a week, the oarsmen still cram in four other workouts each week.

During spring break, the team will travel to Princeton where they will be on double and triple sessions, including scrimmages with the Princeton heavyweights and lightweights and the Rutgers crews. The trip is being taken at a personal expense to each oarsman of fifty dollars.

The racing season begins on April 6 against the MIT lightweight crews. Faster than heavyweight crews, they should provide an excellent tune-up opportunity for all crews.

April 13 will find the Minutemen racing on their home course at the Connecticut River near Coolidge Bridge against LaSalle College of Philadelphia and Imperial College of London, England. The British crew will be arriving in the United States on April 1, and will be living with the oarsmen for the following two and one-half weeks. Though they will be practicing with the UMass crews they will race only once in order that they may get a taste of competition with other area crews.

April 20, the Aggies will be in Boston for a grudge match with B.U. Two years ago, the heavies lost to the Terriers by a length and a half (about ten seconds). Last year, after losing the freshmen and JV eights, and varsity-four events to BU, the varsity eight walked past the Boston eight and never looked back, beating them by over three lengths.

After racing Coast Guard at home on the 27th, the crew may not have a race. It is scheduled to race in the New England College Championships in Worcester, but they have been thrown out because of the successes of last season, (because they're too fast, if you can figure that out.) There has since been a deal of dissention among the Board of Stewards of the Regatta, and things are now pretty much up in the air.

The peak of the season arrives on the following weekend, when the oarsmen travel to Philadelphia for the two-day Dad Vail Regatta, where they will work to protect their title as National College Champions.

What the women say

That winning feeling

By JOHN BOCK

Confidence, poise, self-assurance-call it what you want but the UMass Women's gymnasts had it in abundance. For some of the competitors at last weekends Easterns it was a simple playing out of the last act of a play called "The Season." For UMass it was icing on the cake as they walked away with a team title, four individual champions, and the All-Around Champ. And for Springfield College it was a shot at redemption that fell short.

The best to tell the story is to let the women who made it happen talk and here is what they had to say.

Betsy East: "Having the Easterns at home was really super as we went out there and had all those people behind us. The confidence factor was something that we worked on in practice and concentrated on during the meet. Plus we really appreciated the support that tte men's team gave us. It was great to beat Springfield because we beat them by three points not just .5, but better than it was knowing that everyone did their routines as best as they could and that it all clicked."

Marian Kulick: "The team spirit was the most important thing to me and I think it helped us most, plus being at home was important too."

Jodi Hitt: "I came from the University of Georgia and there is just no comparison between the level of competition and the skill that is exhibited here at UMass. I went to the meet knowing that I did everything that I could to prepare and when I got there it was an atmosphere of performing for people and friends, not competing to win something. All our attention was on who was performing for UMass and not on the other teams so when we were up there it was like we were almost alone."

Alicia Goode: We won because we simply wanted to win and that was all the pressure there was on us. Workouts went well and so there was no reason that we couldn't win."

Anne Vexler: "We have an understanding on the team that we expect the best from everybody and that was what we got. Knowing that the crowd was there made our team so much stronger and that pulled us together. The biggest high I've had in four years is winning the beam competition."

Margie Combs: "We don't have to gain anything when we go to nationals just perfect what we have done now. Morale-wise I think we were at our best and could compete as fully as we did."

Jennine Burger: "It was a difference in working on and concentrating on hitting instead of worrying about missing. At the nationals I hope to be able to concentrate and think the same way. I think if all feel positively about the work we have to do and then go out and do it we will win."

Bruins favored, N.C. state confident in NCAA semis

By KEN RAPPOPART
AP Sports Writer

GREENSBORO, N.C. (AP) - UCLA had the favorite's role and North Carolina State the confidence Thursday as the basketball superpowers headed for their publicized showdown in the NCAA semifinal playoffs.

Unawed by UCLA, cocky North Carolina State players predicted there wouldn't be a replay of last December's 84-66 thrashing by the Bruins in St. Louis. "We're 85 per cent better now than we were then... We were a little bit awed the first time we played UCLA, said Moe Rivers, one of the North Carolina State catalysts in Saturday's semifinal struggle with UCLA at the Greensboro Coliseum.

North Carolina State, which will face UCLA in the nightcap of a semifinal doubleheader after Kansas meets Marquette, has won 26 games in a row since the UCLA disaster. On the other hand, the Bruins, winners of seven straight NCAA championships and nine in the last 10 years, have lost three games since the victory over North Carolina State.

The Bruins have been installed as slight favorites despite their status in the polls-they're ranked No. 2 behind North Carolina State. But the pint spread will fluctuate-daily depending on an important element-the condition of Wolfpack forward David Thompson.

Victim of a concussion and 15-inch head wound in last week's Eastern regional finals against Pitt, Thompson's health has been the most dramatic story leading up to the summit meeting with UCLA.

"His biggest problem right now is that he's very tired," says North Carolina State Coach Norm Sloan. "He has had so many friends who've wanted to see him he hasn't been able to rest."

Wing-Chun is much more than a 'way to knock a man down'

By BILL HOWELL

Beautiful Spring-Wing Chun.

Kung Fu's hundreds of styles; Master A. Chan, UMass Chemical Engineering graduate student (sifu of Amherst's Kung Fu Academy) offers Wing Chun and Tai Chi to all who want to learn.

The most popular system in Hong Kong, Wing Chun is taught in Amherst as a complete technique. Students advance through forms (precision drills) with a minimum amount of progress and practice expected between workouts. Prospective students are screened by the master. Those who seek only a better way to knock another man down are turned away; progress through forms and years weeds out undesirables. Kung Fu masters world-wide have only recently opened their doors to those not of Chinese ancestry; all maintain that they soon, if not immediately, discern the intentions of their novices.

Sifu (father) obtains respect from his family in various ways, some obvious, all sincere. Mr. Chan honors the image of the late Grand Master Yip Man, speaks of his own obedience to his teacher Master Ho Kim and insists upon respect at all times. Kwoon (school) rules are strictly enforced, students may be dismissed for many reasons including secrecy infractions.

Derived by Madame Yim Wing Chun during the 16th century from the snake and crane forms of the Shaolin visible school, Wing Chun's characteristic exercise is Sticky Hands. Opponents stand an arm's length apart, arms outstretched, attempting hand strikes; attack is felt in the opponent's arms, countered with subtle elbow movements. Advanced Wing Chun people do this blindfolded.

Not all is empty hand combat. Weapons are as much a tradition as is the ancient medicine in which Master Chan believes. Kung Fu weapons appear as large, heavy deadly tools which all perservering students eventually learn. Monthly seminars introduce Chinese culture.

Open Monday to Friday 3 p.m.-10:30 p.m., Kung Fu Academy begins new classes each month. Master Chan's telephone is 253-5602. If you are interested in Kung Fu you should call him.

THE WARY GAZE of Wesley Bauver was a poor defense against the blow that Russel Selvitello (Back to camera) administered to Bauver's head a moment later. Both are UMass undergrads practicing at the Kung Fu academy.

Steve Miller

Thanks for the memories

"Thanks for the memories..."

They lost, and I was numb. I sat motionless until the score read: Fairfield 12, Hawaii 2. But there's always next year, isn't there?

For Al Skinner, Rick Pitino, Peter Trow, John Olson, and ME, there is no next year. Five times we "had" to win; five times we failed. Three times we went to overtime, three times we came up short.

Saturday night was my last basketball game as an undergrad. Am I the team manager of the team? A statistician? A casualty of tryouts? No, I'm just another Joe Fan.

As I sat in my seat in section 339 following the 73-69 overtime loss to a fine Artis Gilmore-less and Pembroke Burrow-less Jacksonville team, I recalled many fond moments: Julius Erving (what more can I say), Kenny (Hawk Harrelson) Mathias going up for a rebound; John Betancourt--a bomb from the corner; Chris Coffin--tough "D" and 4 or 5 fouls; Rich Vogley arching a 25-footer; Tommy Austin, Charlie Peters, and Tommy Mac (McLaughlin); a big win last year over Fordham in the Cage; 78-71 over Missouri last year at the Garden; 108-38 over Maine a month ago at the Cage...

The season began with the ineligibility of Jim Town (where would we get rebounding now?). An NCAA bid? Ridiculous!! NIT? An outside chance at best.

A satisfying win over Satch Sanders and Harvard, 9 more wins until a scoreless 3 minutes and a 77-76 loss to NCAA bound Providence. An NCAA bid? We're still in the hunt.

The debacle at Syracuse, consecutive overtime losses to B.C. and UConn. Oh well, there go the NCAA's.

The crushing victory over Maine, convincing victories at Fordham and Durham. We still have a shot at the NCAA's, an NIT bid for sure!!!

The players want NCAA, Coach Leaman says NIT would be better for school and students. The coach is "always" right, isn't he?? On to New York! Bring on the Dolphins!!!!

The long drive home on Sunday. For Al Skinner, Rick Pitino, Peter Trow, and John Olson, the varsity clock ran out. It expired when everyone though there was time for three more games.

Time has run out on me too. I'll be a paying customer from now on. But I've got memories of 79 victories, scenes I'll always cherish. And I know that the past four UMass basketball teams gave everything they had, every game.

To Coach Leaman (especially), his staff, and all of the players I've seen in a Redmen-Minutemen uniform, from Tommy Austin to Rich Vogley--Thanks for the memories...

Swim women splash fast in nationals

Four UMass women swimmers traveled to Penn State University this weekend to compete in the AIAW National Collegiate Swimming and Diving Championships. Records fell in practically every event in the three day meet as teams from all over the United States culminated their seasons. Several '72 Olympic and World Games competitors accounted for the many record breaking performances.

UMass was well represented by Mary Ellen Dash of Elnora, New York. "Melon" was one of the top twenty winners in three events. With a time of 1:02.1 for the 100 yard butterfly, Melon earned 15th place in the championship, while her 100 freestyle time of 56.5 copped the 17th slot. Dash, the New England Champion in the 200 yard Individual Medley, took 19th place in this event with her fastest time of 2:19.9.

Other swimmers Junior Laurie Seluk and Freshwomen Cindy Whiting and Carol Griffiths combined with Dash to swim the 200 and 400 freestyle relays in their fastest times of the season, 1:49.0 and 4:00.0.

The National Championship went to Arizona State University followed by UMiami, and U. Washington.

'Hungry' Norton vs. 'elusive' Foreman

By TOM O'CONNELL

Amongst the headlines and endless articles on college basketball, exhibition baseball, and signings of college stars for next football season, you may find one or two articles on the upcoming fight for the Heavyweight Championship of the World. The media coverage is, as usual, not proportional to the number of interested fans who consider a title fight as exciting as any World Series or Super Bowl. Even if it is a Foreman-Norton fight.

I, like many other fans, am not as excited about this contest as I usually am about a Heavyweight Championship fight. It is difficult to accept the legitimacy of a championship fight between a champion who ducks the top contenders and a challenger who lost his last fight. (although that decision was highly disputed) Anyway, Tuesday night we'll have it. George Foreman, in his first real defense of his title, will battle Ken Norton, conquerer of Muhammed Ali and loser to him in their very close rematch.

Foreman, who won the title 14 months ago today from Joe Frazier, defended his title once, against Joe "King" Roman, last summer. The unranked Roman provided little competition for George, as expected, and was KO'd in the first round. Between fights Foreman keeps busy by attempting to make credible excuses for ducking Ali, Quarry, and Frazier, and trying to settle his divorce. Since winning the title his image has changed from all-American boy to the heavy.

Norton seems to be the "hungrier" of the two, if his attitude in public and training habits can be said to measure this factor. He is a hard training, hard fighting ex-Marine whose edginess of late appears to mean he is ready. Apparently, Norton hasn't gone "big time" as a result of his current success and realizes that this may be his only shot at the Big One.

Physically, they are the two strongest men in boxing. But Norton will have to outbox his opponent, who is the strongest man in boxing, to win. Norton had to take a lot of jabs from Ali to land punches, and though it may not be so fast, Foreman's jab is the most jolting since Joe Louis. A big question is whether or not Norton can avoid those jabs, which Foreman uses to set up his wild, unbelievably powerful roundhouses. Other big questions are Foreman's abilities to take a solid punch and last 15 rounds should he have to.

Despite my complaints of the bout's legitimacy, I see it interesting enough to invest $10 for a closed circuit seat. I want to see Norton's strategy and the results of Foreman's test.

I think Foreman will put him away in the middle rounds. But if Norton can last the distance, don't be surprised...

Only YanCon school without own ice

Hadley zone ordinances latest holdup

Hockey rink held up since 1961

By RICH SEVIERI

Jack Leaman replaced John Orr as head basketball coach in 1966. The following year he led UMass to a tie for the Yankee Conf. crown; and it's first win at Storrs in 32 years.

Bil Tindall's 41 point record performance against Vermont, and the play of all ECAC guard Joe Disacarcina highlighted that 67 team. Tindall closed out his career with 1277 points, 3rd highest in UMass's history.

STEVE KOSAKOWSKI
"Hockey will outdraw basketball up here."

Leaman's 68-69 team captured the Yan-Con crown again, and tied the school record for most victories with their 17-7 season. A one-point upset loss to Rhode Island cost UMass a NIT bid.

It was in the 68-69 season that the crowds really began to flock to the Cage. Attendance was sporadic through the early 60's, 4,000 for one game, 1,500 for the next. The crowds were consistently above 3,000 in 68, and a record crowd of 5,500 turned out for Fordham.

The finest hours of the basketball program were yet to come as the decade closed in December of 69. Two thousand were turned away from the Cage as Julius Erving, playing in his first varsity game, set a school rebounding record of 28, in UMass's upset of Providence.

In 1961 Athletic Director McGuirk said that Hicks would have to be replaced soon by a combination field house-assembly hall. Hicks was 30 years old then, and beginning to show signs of wear and tear. Used for basketball; baseball; track; concerts; and any large gathering, a building the whole campus used and still uses.

A hockey explosion hit Eastern Mass. in the 60's. At UMass it went off like a cap gun.

The hockey team did not play a home game indoors until the roof was put on Amherst's Orr Rink in 1966. Before playing at Orr, coach Steve Kosakowski drove around with nets strapped to the top of his car looking for a place to practice.

Kosakowski retired in 67 with only 78 wins after 12 years as head hockey coach. He had enough trouble just recruiting players, worrying about winning came second.

"We were honest with the kids," said Kosakowski after retiring." We told them we use an outdoor rink, you have to bum a ride to get there, and shovel the ice between periods."

After UMass helped UNH dedicate their $600,000 Whoop Snively Arena in 65, it left them the only Yankee Conf. school without it's own ice facilities.

The Athletic Department had a rink planned as early as 1961. Six years and 5.5 million dollars later, Athletic Director McGuirk announced the site chosen for the rink. McGuirk felt the proposed rink on the northern boundary of the intramural fields would be in constant use.

"In New England artificial ice should be available 10, maybe 11 months of the year," said McGuirk. "A rink could be used by the entire student population. Open from 6 a.m.-midnight, for intramurals, free skating, a skating club, and area high schools."

President Lederle agreed with McGuirk but the University was short of funds when he said, "we've got to get a rink in the near future, the whole student body would benefit, but it would have to be self liquidating."

There was talk of the rink being completed by 70, and ex-coach Kosakowski predicted, "hockey will outdraw basketball up here, and the tickets will be as hard to get as football tickets in the fall."

At the end of the decade there were quite a few empty seats in the seldom used stadium, and the construction of the hockey rink had been postponed indefinetly.

President Lederle's and Athletic Director McGuirk's goal of being "the first choice athletically among the New England state schools" has never pertained to hockey. In fact the neglect shown the hockey program here has helped turn New Hampshire and Vermont into national powers.

Both New Hampshire and Vermont built moderately priced rinks in the mid-60's, and began recruiting Massachusetts-bred players. New Hampshire which was ranked No. 2 in the country this year, was led by two All-Americans from Mass., Gordie Clark and Cap Raeder. Division II champion Vermont, had eight players from Mass. Mass.

New Hampshire and Vermont's outstanding seasons brought them more ink in hockey mad Boston, than any exposure UMass received for football or basketball championships there.

Massachusetts high schools and the new junior hockey leagues will turn out more potential collegiate hockey players this year than any other state except Minnesota. While Minnesota was winning the National Hockey Championship this year, good players were playing hockey with club facilities at UMass.

The near future, President Lederle spoke of, is now past. Thirteen years in the planning, the hockey rink remains a political and economic football.

The town of Hadley zoning ordinances are the latest holdup.

Financing of the rink may be it's major stumbling block. Increases in student athletic fees for financing would probably be nixed by the student senate. And a student referendum would also face a stiff fight.

In the mean time the majority of the hockey program's budget, which is financed by student athletic fees, will continue to go into the coffers of Amherst College. The money spent on rental fees to Amherst, Greenfield. and Deerfield Academy in the past 15 years would have made a sizeable down payment on any rink.

JACK LEAMAN
Cage sellouts a tradition

The rink may eventually get built someday, and with all the natural hockey talent in Mass., the national recognition, and publicity in Boston that the Athletic Dept. hoped football would produce, may arrive.

But don't be surprised if the rink is still in the planning stage when UMass Boston, with 18 skaters from Charlestown and South Boston, plays a Tennesse team that skates on line from Arlington and another from Norwood, for the National Championship.

Bruins make St. Louis blue

BOSTON (AP) - Bobby Orr fired his 28th, 29th, and 30th goals of the season as the Boston Bruins overpowered the St. Louis Blues 7-0 to move within one point of clinching the National Hockey League East Division title Thursday night.

Boston goalie Gil Gilbert recorded his sixth shutout, his third over the Blues who have not scored on him in 180 consecutive minutes of hockey.

Orr's power play goal was the only score of the first period. He tapped in a rebound after Phil Esposito's shot hit goalie Wayne Stephenson and the goal post before settling on Orr's stick.

Boston struck for four goals in the second period to seal the fate of the Blues, who have won only two of their last 22 games and are fading fast in the race for the fourth playoff position in the West.

Orr stick-handled past two St. Louis defenders to score his 29th goal at 1:50 and John Bucyk collected his 28th on a give-and-go with rookie Dave Forbes at 5:52.

NEW YORK (AP) - Paul Berwanger scored with two seconds remaining as Boston College, pressing furiously in the second half, battled back to edge Connecticut 76-75 in a quarter-final game of the National Invitation Tournament Thursday night.

Connecticut, buoyed by 43 busloads of fans, ran off eight straight points early in the first half to take a 14-6 lead. Boston College shot only 25 per cent from the field in the first half and didn't make a field goal for more than eight minutes. The Huskies, up by 17 with about 14½ minutes to go, tried to slow down the pace and Boston answered with a furious floor-length press.

Mark Raterink joined Bob Carrington to provide the scoring punch and the Eagles came roaring back to tie the game on a basket by Will Morrison with three minutes remaining.

Sox edge Expos in tenth, 7-6

DAYTONA BEACH, Fla. (AP) - The Boston Red Sox capped a wild afternoon marked by 22 walks and pushed across a tie-breaking run on a wild pitch in the 10th inning Thursday for a 7-6 exhibition victory over the Montreal Expos.

The Red Sox tied the score 6-6 in the eighth with three runs on four consecutive walks, a fielder's choice grounder and Danny Cater's pinch double to left center. They scored the winning tally on a walk, a single by Rick Burleson and wild pitch.

Four Montreal pitchers issued 13 bases on balls, while four Boston hurlers walked nine. There also were two wild pitches, a couple of costly Boston errors and a balk.

The Red Sox jumped to a 3-0 first inning lead on an infield hit by Rick Miller, a walk, a wild pitch, a single by Dwight Evans and a double by Rico Petrocelli.

The Expos tied the count in the second with the help of a throwing error by Miller.

Poetry, me boy!

'Twas the eve of St. Patty's and all through the town
All the Umies were drinkin' but wearin' a frown.
They were in New York, that city of sin
A thriving metropolis, that city they're in.

The season had started way back in December
So long ago that it's hard to remember.
Way back on that day they played them a game
'gainst the Crimson of Harvard I b'lieve was their name.

Then a technical foul was called on the spot
So the Crimson of Harvard would get a free shot.
And there at the foul line adribblin' the ball
Was one Mr. Jenkins, so big and so tall.
Well he sank the shot and now here's the scoop
'fore the season had started we were down half a hoop.

When the season was over we held our head high
'cause into New York the Umies would fly.
Go Skinner, Go Murphy, Go Pitino and Trow
On Endicott, on Duarte and Mayfield go, go.

With the shamrocks aswayin' and the Umies aplayin'
We all felt that this was the year we'd by sayin'
On the top of the world, that's where we are
We'll tell everyone, those near and those far.
'Twas after four losses and twenty-one wins
That we came to New York that city of sin.
For the game with the Dolphins of Jacksonville fame
We'd beat them and then have a national name.

But our plans went awry and the game went askew
Until next year I'll wait, now how about you?

An editorial

It's time to make everyone pay

Since The Collegian began publishing with undergraduate student senate funding in the fifties, successive editorial boards have faced a paradox.

The newspaper has only two basic sources of revenue to pay more than $270,000 annual costs that are part of publishing a daily newspaper — advertising and the back pockets of the 18,139 UMass undergraduates.

The Collegian has improved its business management and advertising solicitation to the point where in fiscal 1975 we anticipate that 70 per cent of our costs, including an annual $182,354.00 printing bill, will be paid by revenue from advertisements you see in the paper.

The other source is an annual student senate appropriation. In fiscal 1975, The Collegian is asking $82,131.00 from the senate, money which ultimately is part of the $20 to $30 student activities fee charged each undergraduate on the semester bill.

Other than classifieds, The Collegian has no other revenue. Besides the advertising generated by our student salesmen, UMass undergraduates foot the bill.

But while only undergraduates pay for the newspaper, the editors have never regulated who reads it. Graduate students, administrators, faculty members and University employees are among the many daily readers of The Collegian. They enjoy the best campus coverage a staff of volunteers can provide.

The paradox for the editors has been that undergraduates pick-up their newspaper daily having already paid for it, while other readers are enjoying the benefits of the paper for free.

The editors feel it is unfair to the 18,000 undergraduates who do support us to let the situation continue

The Graduate student senate before vacation defeated a motion to fund The Collegian for $15,000 in fiscal 1975. That figure was determined by undergraduate senate treasurer Paul J. Hamel as a "fair share" for 3,400 graduates towards meeting the costs of the newspaper they read.

Student rights not violated, judge rules

Students here in Amherst "were not denied access to the political process within the town", US District Judge W. Arthur Garrity, Jr. said March 22, the day Collegian presses stopped running for semester break. Judge Garrity made the statement in dismissing the voting rights suit of Eric Walgren against the Amherst board of selectmen.

Walgren, 34, a self styled radical, came in third in a five-way race for selectman in the town primary election held Jan. 19, 1973. He and two other students sued, claiming the selectmen effectively disenfranchised students at UMass and two other colleges by scheduling the election during the schools' winter recess.

However, in a vote since the suit was filed, the town selectmen said they would not in the future schedule elections during University holidays.

Town elections this year are set for March 5, a date agreed upon by Walgran and student representatives from the Five-College area.

Viet vets have their say in D.C.

(MDC Photo-Kris Jackson)

WASHINGTON--UMass veterans vote on support of amnesty for draft dodgers and deserters the night before the Senate hearing. The motion carried, 26 to 6.

By DENNY MATTEAU
MDC Staff

Young Viet Nam-Era vets gathered in the rainy streets of Washington last Friday and in Senate and Congressional offices to present charges that our government has not lived up to its commitments. As one vet put it, "We were asked to commit six years of our lives and told about all these bennies waiting for us when we got out, and where are they?"

Activities of the day included a morning conference with Senator Edward Kennedy (D-Mass), and Congressman Silvio Conte (R-Pittsfield) in which about 35 vets explained the difficulties resulting from Veterans Administration requirements that a vet take a full course load. This makes it nearly impossible to hold down a part-time job to supplement the $220 a month that a single vet gets for nine months of the year while in school.

At a Senate hearing later in the morning, at least a hundred vets from New York City and California as well as from UMass Amherst & Boston jammed the room while more stood in the corridor. Senator Vance Harthe, (D-Ind) chairperson of the Senate Committee on Veterans' Affairs presided on a panel which included Senator Alan Cranston (D-Calif) and Senators Hughes (D-Mont) and Thurmond (D-Carol). Senator Hughes was absent and Sen. Thurmond left early. Odell Vaughn, VA Benefits Director, represented the Veterans' Administartion in place

UMass tuition, going up??

By BOB MAC KAY

Legislation that would affect thousands of Mass. students attending public colleges — including every student at UMass-Amherst — is now before the Education Committee at the State House.

State Rep. James A. O'Brien, Jr. (D-Fall River) is sponsoring a bill that calls for tuition rates at public institutions to be based on the actual cost per student. According to Rep. O'Brien, passage of the bill (House 1770) would mean that the tuition here at UMass-Amherst would be more than $2,000. Tuition at UMass-Boston would also be more than $2,000, while tuition charges at the community colleges would be approximately $1,400. Tuition rates at Mass. Maritime would be around $3,300. O'Brien said that tuition at the UMass Medical School in Worcester would go "way up."

The Fall River legislator said that he was sponsoring the bill because he wanted to help out the poor students attending state schools. The bill provides for full or partial scholarships to students based on need. O'Brien said that the present system, where there is a set tuition for everyone, is unfair because the low-income student must pay the same tuition as a student from a wealthy family.

"I'm not trying to hurt any youngster going to school," said O'Brien. "But the present standard tuition system is inequitable. The poor student must pay the same as the rich student. My bill will give scholarships to those who need them, and will make the rich pay more."

Rep. O'Brien said he was also sponsoring the bill in order to provoke some thought about the

Conte on impeachment

The Massachusetts Congressman for Amherst and western Massachusetts says impeachment may "include acts which may not be subject to criminal indictment if those acts tend to subvert to a substantial degree our Constitutional institutions..."

U.S. Rep. Silvio O. Conte (R-Pittsfield) gives his views on the impeachment process in a statement solicited by The Collegian last month and published today.

Massachusetts democratic Congressman Robert F. Drinan, Tobert H. MacDonald, and Michael J. Harrington are among the seven New England representatives split favoring either the impeachment of Nixon or his resignation, according to The Globe.

No Republican congressman from New England has called for Nixon to leave office or be removed. Conte is a Republican.

His statement is printed in full on page twelve of today's Collegian.

Families of slain Kent State students react to indictments

CLEVELAND, Ohio (AP) - Parents of Kent State University students who were slain by National Guard gunfire May 4, 1970, issued a statement Sunday charging that politics had delayed convening a federal grand jury to investigate the incident.

The meeting came two days after a federal grand jury returned indictments against eight former National Guardsmen in connection with the 1970 shootings. The indictments charge the eight with violating the civil rights of students who were shot.

After their private meeting, the group issued a statement charging that there had been White House "intrusion" in the investigation and saying it appeared "there has been political interference with the judicial process."

The parents suggested that the delay in convening the grand jury might become part of the deliberations of the House Judiciary Committee during its impeachment investigations.

The statement read by Mrs. Louis A. Schroeder of Lorain, mother of one of the slain students, said former Atty. Gen. John Mitchell's "decision in August 1971 not to allow a federal grand jury was made at a time when he was already actively engaged in the management of President Nixon's re-election campaign."

The statement said Mitchell's decision came "in the face of the strong conclusions of the Scranton Commission that the shootings were 'unnecessary, unwarranted and inexcusable'."

The parents and others who have met with them regularly over the years had scheduled a meeting at First Methodist Church in downtown Cleveland. That meeting was cancelled, however, and the group met privately in an office building.

The statement said a major concern of the group "has been the failure of the Justice Department to convene a federal grand jury within a reasonable period of time after the Scranton Commission and the FBI investigations.

"It has become apparent to us that there has been political interference..."

The statement added that "as recently as May, 1973, shortly before Mr. Elliot N. Richardson reopened the investigation, the White House specifically ruled out the convening of a federal grand jury, and the White House commented specifically that if a grand jury were convened, no indictments would result.

"This was an inappropriate intrusion by the White House into the affairs of the judicial branch of government."

That statement was a reference to a letter written by Leonard Garment, special White House counsel, May 25, 1973, rejecting petitions and a legal brief, submitted by one of the wounded Kent students asking for a grand jury.

Phonathon—all go

"The Students may really bomb on the phone, but I don't think they will."

So says Bobbie La Porte, student chairperson of the phonathon, one day before the money raising crusade is scheduled to begin.

Some 43 students will man 30 phones tomorrow night from 6 to 10. The students will be divided into teams representing the Sylvan dormitories.

"Never in the country has a phonathon been completely comprised of students and never have there been 500 students," La Porte said.

She hopes to raise $50,000 which will be used for scholarships and special programs, such as Outreach, at UMass.

Other phonathons this years have been based in Springfield and Boston.

About 600 students will participate in the phonathon which will run to April 28. The team that raises the most money will be given "at least a couple of kegs of beer", La Porte said.

Beer will also be served to the phonathon participants. About 70 cases have been delivered to Memorial Hall.

La Porte said teams and individuals may still participate in the competition and should call 5-2543 for further information.

Federal food research center set up here

A center that will evaluate thermal processing for low-acid foods canned commercially in the U.S. has been set up by the Federal Food and Drug Administration at the Department of Food Science and Nutrition here.

The Center for Evaluation of Thermal Processes for Processed Food is directed by UMass Food Science Professor Charles R. Stumbo, an internationally-recognized authority on thermal processing and the author of a definitive taxt on the subject.

It will play a key role in the FDA's research and safety program against botulism poisoning, directly connected with the improper thermal processing of low-acid foods. The botulism bacteria, which can grow in the absence of air, produce toxins; but they do not grow in acid media such as most canned tomatoes, fruit or other high-acid foods.

According to Dr. F. J. Francis, head of the UMass Department of Food Science and Nutrition, "The FDA has been very active in developing regulations to insure public safety in the area of thermally processed foods. To insure better control of the technology, regulations concerning good manufacturing practice and better control of heat processing have been developed. One is that all processors of low-acid foods must have a specially trained retort supervisor present at all times. (A retort is the vessel in which the heat treatment of the food takes place). Another regulation involves compulsory registration of the heat process. These data allow the FDA to judge the adequacy of these treatments to prevent public health problems.

"There is a very fine line," Dr. Francis added, "between maintenance of quality in food and its preservation. A processor does not dare give a container too little heat treatment, or the food will spoil, or worse, constitute a public health hazard. If the processor overheats his product, the quality deteriorates very rapidly. This area has been researched in great detail and is well known for all foods on the American market today. However, it is a continuing process, since new foods are continually being developed and new processes have to be developed for them. In view of the tremendous volume of thermally processed foods on the market, this promisses to be a continuing effort."

The UMass center, he added, is charged with the responsibility of advising the FDA on the adequacy of thermal processing for low-acid foods commerically processed in the U.S. Assisting Professor Stumbo in its operation is Dr. K.S. Purohit, a specialist in engineering and computer applications to the food industry. The center is federally funded through the Food and Drug Administration.

Appley to head Clark U.

WORCESTER — Mortimer H. Appley, Dean of the UMass-Amherst graduate school, was chosen to become the new president of Clark University here, the Clark board of trustees announced Saturday.

Appley will become the sixth president of Clark, a small, urban, liberal arts University known for excellence in geography and pyschology graduate studies. He succeeds Glenn W. Ferguson, who left Clark last year to become the president of the University of Connecticut.

Appley, 52, who is taking a sabbatical at the University of Freiburg in Germany, was unavailable for comment.

Randolph W. Bromery, UMass-Amherst chancellor, said yesterday he is "pleased" at Appley's appointment, but "naturally sorry" to see him leave UMass-Amherst.

"We've known for some time that he was one of the top applicants," Bromery said yesterday.

The Chancellor said a search would begin for a successor to Appley, and added that acting graduate dean Robert B. Woodbury is "among the top choices" for the position.

Bromery said the appointment and search would be under the direction of Robert L. Gluckstern, campus provost, to whom Appley reports. Gluckstern was not at his home to comment yesterday.

Appley, former UMass-Amherst psychology department chairman, is known by colleagues as a dedicated scholar who can also function as an effective administrator.

Clark is the second-oldest graduate school in America. It accepted its first undergraduates in 1902 and opened for graduate education in 1987.

Among small private universities, Clark has been hard hit by inflation and spiraling tuition. Appley faces the immediate task of finding new sources of revenue or instituting hard-line cost cutting.

School of Ed. to sponsor Marathon

By MARY MUIRHEAD
MDC Staff

The Spring Marathon will be held at the School of Education and Marks Meadow Laboratory School during the week of April 15 through the 19th. Sheila Inderlied, a graduate student in Organizational Development, is coordinating the program along with Robert Evans, Cindy Olken, and Chris Polonski.

So far, over 300 hours of events have been scheduled. Jonathan Kozol, "an educational artist" and author of Death at an Early Age, Open Classroom, and Free Schools, will speak in Mahar Auditorium on Wednesday, April 17 through the cooperative efforts of the Distinguished Visitors Program and the Marathon.

Other events include a whole day devoted to alternative schools, a "Sports Day", and Science Fiction movies. "Dr. Strangelove" will be shown twice on April 15 in the Marks Meadow Auditorium through the cooperation of Dan Lucid (Comparative Literature) and the Marathon.

This spring, there is more cross-campus contribution than ever before. People from the art, music, and entomology departments are contributing events. The Marathon is free. It is for everybody — not just education majors.

Full-time UMass students may earn up to two University credits by signing the rosters at each Marathon event attended.

Non-students can get credit through the Continuing Education Program. One full credit costs $27.

People will be available during the Marathon for information regarding these matters.

With the approaching Spring weather, this will probably be the last winter scene we'll see for some months; little consolation when it's 90.

UMass has a "wart clinic"

The UMass Health Center has so many wart cases that a nurse spends one full day a week treating them at the "wart clinic." Last academic year, the Health Center treated a minimum of 2,130 cases--a minimum because this figure doesn't count warts a physician might treat incidentally when a student has another medical problem. And the figure counts patients with warts, not warts. Some patients have more than one, maybe several on the heel of a foot.

About 60 to 70 per cent of all warts treated at the UMass Health Center are on the heels or soles of the feet. These and warts on finger cuticles are the hardest to get rid of, according to Eva Majeau, the UMass nurse who treats at the wart clinic. She has been eliminating warts for six years, nowadays seeing about 40 patients each Wednesday when the wart clinic is open.

Warts are caused by a skin virus, which is contagious, and there are medical cures. And warts are more common than most people would believe.

Nurse Majeau treats the unwanted growths with salicylic acid plaster or with liquid nitrogen.

Dr. Frederick Lee, who surgically treats wart cases referred to him by Nurse Majeau, hopes the UMass Health Center will acquire a machine which would allow more accurate dosages of nitrogen than the present cotton swab method. The machine, he says, would also speed up treatment.

He says an education program planned for students will lessen the number of return visits to the Health Center by giving students more self-help information. The alicylic acid paster treatment is administered on the self-help idea now. Nurse Majeau applies a plaster and gives students a supply with instructions.

Fooling around goes way back

By MICHAEL GERY

Returning to classes today might be an absurd mission fabricated by the scheduling office or some other sinister agent engaged in tomfoolery.

April 1

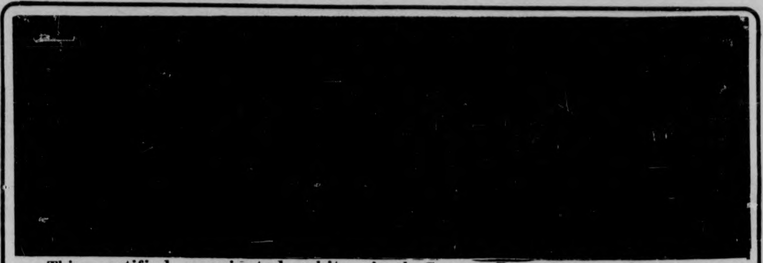
On April 1 it is traditional for schemers to send dupes on "sleeveless errands," and the laugh is always in proportion to the trouble given.

Last week the scheduling office denied there was a trick up its sleeve.

The original All Fools' Day joke might have been played by Noah for the amusement of those on the Ark. On the first day of the tenth Hebrew month, Noah sent a dove from the Ark. But the dove returned because the flood waters had not abated.

It is more likely that April 1 became a fools' day following a French calendar reform in 1564. Before then, March 25 commenced the Christian New Year, and April 1 culminated the customary eight days of celebration. Once New Year's Day was carried back to January 1, the first of April became a day for mock merry-making.

The practice of "making fools" can be traced to the Roman Saturnalia festival, when all forms of order were temporarily abandoned, including attending school and commencing wars. Primitive Christians upheld the custom during the Feast of Fools, when mock elections of popes and cardinals took place along with "singing and dancing in the churches, in lewd attitudes, to ludicrous anthems."



This certified, vaccinated, white, Anglo-Saxon, Protestant male was seen streaking through the snow between Herter Hall and Fine Arts.

It is an ancient Hindu custom during the Huli Festival held at the vernal equinox that "Hindus of every class send people on errands and expeditions that are to end in disappointment, and raise a laugh at the expense of the person sent."

For four centuries the French have made fools on April 1, calling them "poisson d'Avril," meaning "April fish" — a young fish that is easily caught. In English we might term such fools "suckers" or "silly mackerels."

Some of the pranks recorded by antiquarian writers are outrageous. "Rustics" were usually the victims, sent to bookstores to procure a "History of Eve's Grandmother", or to a grocer for a pint of pigeon's milk.

The Scots call it "hunting the Gowk." "Gowk" originally meant cuckoo. A messenger is sent from house to house, or tree to tree, where he finds messages saying "this is the first of Aprile, hunt the gowk another mile."

Persons have gone to jail for stealing, poisoning food, or attacking passers-by all in hope of making April fools. Perhaps it were such turnabouts which led the author of Poor Robin's Almanack to note in 1760:

It is a thing to be disputed,
Which is the greatest fool reputed,
The man who innocently went
Or he that him designedly sent?

Marty Kelley's rude face

Loco boy makes good

By MIKE KNEELAND
MDC Staff

When Marty Kelley began his internship at WAAB radio station in Worcester, he left his rude face and jock rash at UMass.

That was a smart move. Kelley has now completed the internship and has stepped into a full-time job with the station.

"I'm only getting $2.00 an hour," he said, "but I know a lot of people who would love that."

Strictly a sports commentator of sorts at UMass, Kelley is responsible for gathering and presenting news as well as sports for the no-music station.

He acknowledges the occasional lack of professionalism he displayed at UMass, such as the Sunday night football games, but says the experience gave him a lot of needed self confidence. At WAAB, however, he quickly learned that professional journalism can be far different than WMUA or Collegian journalism.

"I know what it's like now to work all night on a documentary and having to do it all over again for my boss because it wasn't good enough," he said.

Things were tough for Kelley from the start. Like a soul seeking purification, Kelley says he wanted it to be that way. He frequently worked 80-hour weeks and since he was an intern, he received no pay.

To make matters worse Kelley had his car towed twice, lost his only winter jacket, had auto engine problems, and was frequently hungry.

"I used to thumb to basketball games in the middle of January with no coat," he recalled.

Kelley's air mates say he has plenty of talent and could go far in the broadcasting business. He has already interviewed most of the Boston Celtics, written and produced 30-minute documentaries, and pepared a package deal for the business department. He hopes the station will cover UMass football this Fall and says it will bring in some $6,000 to WAAB.

Kelley's immediate boss, a 35-year old former boxer named Bob Morgan, doesn't "take" to the young college guy. When not threatening to bash in Kelley's teeth, he is writing semi-literate memos to the young broadcaster offering such encouragements as: "Listen asshole, you have made an enemy in me...you'd better give me a wide, wide berth."

Professional jealousies are no uncommon in the broadcast world. Kelley is becoming aware of that.

This whole experience is not enough for Kelley to singularly inhale and digest. He's writing a book for future students who also want to "make it."

Publication will have to hole off for a while. Kelley knows that $2.00 an hour is a far cry from the worlds of Keith Jackson and Howard Cosell.

He also knows that Worcester is not far from Amherst, and that's where his rude face and jock rash live on.

For freshman who want to survive

This fall, 100 selected freshmen here will be able to study in an alternate educational project called the Global Survival Freshman Year Program.

The Program consists of interdisciplinary study based on the view that certain fundamental concerns of the present and future must be understood if this planet is to survive.

These concerns are war, peace and world order; cross-cultural communication and conflict; environmental deterioration and economic development; population; and resources and their distribution.

The freshman year program will examine each of these five areas of concern, beginning with an intensive course. After this the freshmen will take courses specially designed for the program by a selected group of global studies core faculty from the humanities, social and natural sciences and professional schools. Related courses from a variety of UMass departments will be added, plus symposiums and independent study options.

Nixon orders veterans benefits speedup

KEY BISCAYNE, Fla. (AP) - President Nixon said yesterday he has ordered a crack management team to investigate snarls in the delivery of benefit checks and services to veterans.

"We owe it to our veterans to be absolutely sure that we're doing the best job possible for them," Nixon said in a national radio address one year and two days after the last American soldier left Vietnam.

In recent months, complaints have been widespread about delayed or misdirected monthly checks for Vietnam veterans now attending college under the GI bill. There also has been criticism of other services for veterans.

Nixon said after these complaints were raised at a White House news conference by Sarah McClendon, a correspondent for Texas newspapers and "one of the most spirited reporters in Washington," he asked the Veterans Administration for answers.

The VA took steps to improve its operations, the President said, but "to make still further improvements" he has directed VA Administrator Donald Johnson and Director Roy Ash of the Office of Management and Budget "to set up a crack management team which will take a hard look at the services provided by the VA."

He said the team is to come up with answers within eight weeks.

"Veterans need to know if we can find a better way of delivering checks on time," Nixon said. "They need to know if there is a better way of counseling them on drugs. They need to know if there is a better way to find training and jobs."

In addition to the management team, the President said he was creating within the White House a Domestic Council committee on veterans affairs.

Headed by Johnson and including four Cabinet members, the committee will "ensure that we have policies which pull together the activities of the entire government and more fully meet the needs of the veterans," Nixon said.

The President also said he had directed Johnson to "conduct a thorough investigation of the conditions of our veterans' hospitals and clinics' and to report to him personally within 60 days.

Nixon delivered the latest in his continuing series of week-end radio speeches from his bayside home after attending worship services at a nearby Congregationalist church with daughter Julie Eisenhower and neighbor C. G. Bebe Rebozo.

San Clemente, court cases will reduce Nixon's worth

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Nixon has a final mortgage payment of nearly $250,000 coming due this summer for his San Clemente, Calif., estate, and may be facing other major personal expenses as a result of possible income tax and impeachment proceedings.

Although he was nearly a millionaire on paper as of last May 31, a rapid series of six-figure debts could deplete Nixon's savings and perhaps lead him to take out new loans.

A final payment of $226,660, plus $17,000 interest, is due July 15 to the family from whom he purchased the oceanside San Clemente property five years ago.

The bulk of Nixon's $988,522 in net worth as of May 31 was in real estate.

The two major obligations other than the mortgage payments are only possibilities at this point.

The White House won't speculate on Nixon's finances, although the President himself recently mentioned the possibility of taking a loan.

A joint congressional committee has been reviewing Nixon's 1969-72 tax returns at the President's request. It is expected to say shortly whether it believes Nixon should pay back taxes which, if all his controversial deductions are disallowed, could amount to more than $300,000.

Nixon has said he will abide by the committee findings.

Major points at issue are his deductions for donations of pre-presidential papers to the government, his business use of his San Clemente, Calif., estate, and the tax handling of the sale of two pieces of real estate.

The other possible major expense could be legal fees in connection with the Watergate affair.

Atty. Gen. William Saxbe suggested recently that at some point in any impeachment procedure, Nixon might have to start paying for his own legal defense.

As of Jan. 9, the government had spent $290,418 for the President's legal defense. No updated figure is now available from the White House, but a continuation of that rate of spending would mean the cost has now passed $40,000.

Watergate prosecution and investigation are costing the government more than 10 times as much as the Nixon defense. Congressional investigations and the special prosecutor's office are budgeted at $5.3 million for the fiscal year ending June 30.

Kissinger, bride honeymoon at Acapulco cliff resort

ACAPULCO, Mexico (AP) — U.S. Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger honeymooned yesterday with his bride, the former Nancy Maginnes, in a magnificent villa perched on a cliff overlooking Acapulco Bay and the Pacific.

The couple appeared briefly at a large picture window, apparently to view the ocean, but there was no indication when the Kissingers planned to leave their villa.

The couple arrived in the international resort on Saturday by private jet after a small wedding in Arlington, Va.

Kissinger is 50, his bride 39.

The secretary of state and his bride were expected to be in Acapulco about 10 days. Officials said two special telephones had been installed in the villa so Kissinger could remain in close touch with Washington. He had conferred with Israeli Defense Minister Moshe Dayan only hours before the wedding.

Although rumored for months, the timing of the marriage was a closely guarded secret until the couple was en route to Acapulco. Then an announcement was made at the State Department in the name of the bride's mother, Mrs. Albert B. Maginnes of White Plains, N.Y.

Among the friends and relatives gathered for the wedding were Kissinger's two children by a former marriage, Elizabeth, 15, and David, 12. The ceremony was performed by Judge Francis E. Thomas Jr. A luncheon reception followed the wedding.

Mrs. Kissinger is an aide to former New York Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller, and shares her husband's strong interest in foreign affairs.

She met him at least 10 years ago when she was a student in his foreign policy seminar at Harvard, a Rockefeller aide said.

Kissinger later recommended Miss Maginnes to Rockefeller, and she became a foreign policy aide to the governor. She is still working for him as supervisor of international studies on his Commission on Critical Choices.

Mrs. Kissinger is a graduate of Mount Holyoke College in Massachusetts, and before studying under her new husband at Harvard she taught at the University of California at Berkeley.

Meats and eggs lead food price decline

Consumers got a bit of a break in March, largely thanks to meat and egg sales that caused the family grocery bill to drop slightly, an Associated Press marketbasket survey shows.

The AP checked the prices of 15 food and nonfood items in 13 cities on March 1, 1973, and has rechecked at the beginning of each succeeding month.

The April check showed that for the first time since last October, the marketbasket bill went down in more cities than it went up in. The total was down in nine of 13 cities checked, decreasing an average of 2.2 per cent. The decreases ranged from a fraction of a per cent in Albuquerque, N.M., to 4 per cent in Boston where the price of a pound of chopped chuck dropped from $1.49 to $1.09.

The bill was up in the remaining four cities — Seattle, New York, Miami and Phildelphia — with an average increase of 1.6 per cent.

A look at the long-range picture showed prices everywhere were higher at the beginning of April 1974 than they were on March 1, 1973. The marketbasket bill was up an average of 13.3 per cent over the 13-month period, with increases ranging from 6 per cent in Los Angeles to 25 per cent in Philadelphia.

The current meat sales were prompted by a temporary rise in supplies that pushed down wholesale prices. Government and industry economists have said, however, that the prices probably will go up again in coming months.

Eggs continued their decline, dropping four or five cents a dozen to an average of about 75 cents.

Although the dollar value of the marketbasket declines, an overall look at the items in the survey showed more items went up than down during March, with 32.2 per cent decreasing. Of the remaining items, 36.4 per cent were unchanged and 7.7 per cent were unavailable on one of the two survey dates.

The situation was slightly better than during February, when 33.8 per cent of the items went up in price, 19 per cent went down, 39.5 per cent were unchanged and 7.7 per cent were unavailable.

The increases are prompted by soaring commodity prices. A Department of Agriculture report showed that during 1973 world prices nearly doubled for wheat, soybeans, soybean meal and cocoa beans. The department said the increases were due mainly to production shortages and increased demand in developing countries.

Solzhenitsyn explains views on Russia

ZURICH, Switzerland (AP) - Banished Russian author Alexander Solzhenitsyn said yesterday he has no plans at the moment to visit the United States and is concerned that Americans do not understand his vision for Russia's future.

But in his first interview since his family joined him in exile here two days ago, Solzhenitsyn told The Associated Press that "contact between the peoples of our two huge countries is absolutely essential."

Seated in the living room of his rented, seven-room house, Solzhenitsyn said he and his wife, Natalya, had not completed their inspection of his vital archives she brought with her from Moscow.

The Nobel laureate, exiled from Russia on Feb. 13, indicated his principal aim in granting the interview was to correct "primitive and even mistaken interpretations" in America of his recent "Letter to the Soviet Leaders."

In his 15,000-word essay sent to the Kremlin last fall, Solzhenitsyn exorted the leaders to give up the Soviet Union's world role, disband the Soviet Union and concentrate instead on internal development in Russia proper.

He said his "program," as sent to the Kremlin, was based on the belief that "nations and peoples can attain their supreme spiritual results only at the price of voluntary self-limitation in the outside world, concentrating instead on their mutual development."

Reading his response aloud, he said, "I suggested that all this should be done on a scale far exceeding that which they dream of achieving with nuclear 'detente,'"

Solzhenitsyn claimed U.S. commentators described his views as "nationalism," "utopianism," and "a call to return to the past."

He said "in this way the press is capable of introducing incomprehension between distant parts of the planet rather than internal understanding."

He concluded the written response by stressing the need for Russian-American contacts but added that "I very much regret that I can only participate in these contacts through letters."

The writer said his decision against traveling to the United States "was not a final refusal on principle but only one resulting from the physical limitations on my life here." He apparently was referring to his search for a permanent home and the practical problems of re-establishing his family in the West.

Senate prepares for impeachment

WASHINGTON (AP) — Quiet preparations are under way in several Senate offices for the possible impeachment trial of President Nixon later this year, informed sources say.

With any House action probably more than two months away, no one will admit it publicly.

Democratic Leader Mike Mansfield has said several times he has not started any study of how the Senate would proceed, since rules are set forth in the Senate Manual and he doesn't want to anticipate House action.

However, some work is understood to be in progress in at least two Senate offices, with other studies being made by individual senators.

"No one will be caught unprepared," said one usually well informed source.

Until recently, few senators have been willing to say they expect the House to return articles of impeachment against the President.

Last week, however, Mansfield said he has been told by House members "the votes are there" for impeachment.

British expenses increase rapidly

LONDON (AP) — The new British budget is unlikely to get final approval until summer, but Britons already are finding it more expensive to eat, drink, smoke, and drive — in short, to live.

One theory is that new sales taxes will discourage buying and thereby slow inflation — now running at 13.2 per cent. In practice, however, people often swallow the taxes in the form of higher prices, buy the same amount and stimulate more inflation.

A 10 per cent tax is hardly noticeable on candy bars, which cost only one or two pennies more. But regular gasoline is up 12 cents to $1.32 a gallon, a record high in Britain.

Even with the new tax, gasoline will be cheaper than in many European countries such as Germany, France or Italy, and Britons are expected to continue driving to the continent for vacations in increasing numbers.

Public campaign financing to be debated in Senate

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Senate will start a second week of debate today on campaign reform aimed at preventing another Watergate.

Shaping up in the House is a battle over U.S. military aid to South Vietnam. Also coming up later in the week is a consumer protection bill.

During the first week of action on campaign reform the Senate rejected all efforts to eliminate or modify provisions for public campaign financing to keep politicians from being beholden to private contributors.

No end was in sight as the Senate begins another week of action on amendments, and Sen. James B. Allen, D-Ala., has warned he will filibuster in the end if necessary to keep the bill from being passed.

Sen. Lowell P. Weicker Jr., R-Conn., who opposes public campaign financing, has an alternative that would confine all presidential and congressional campaigning — including fund raising — to the two months before the November elections.

Weicker's amendment, which would abolish the Republican and Democratic national conventions, is to get a vote Tuesday afternoon.

All campaigning would begin the first Tuesday of September, nationwide Democratic and Republican primaries would be held the first Tuesday of October and the general elections would continue to be on the first Tuesday of November under his plan.

Congress' first battle over U.S. aid to Indochina since the Cambodia bombing halt last July 15 is assured when the House takes up a defense supplemental authorization bill tentatively scheduled for Thursday.

A drive to knock a $474 million increase in U.S. military aid to South Vietnam out of the bill had 75 co-sponsors as of Friday afternoon.

Deputy Secretary of Defense William P. Clements testified that unless Congress increases U.S. aid to $1.6 billion, the South Vietnamese will have to start curtailing defenses by mid-April.

N.Y. State Lottery barely hangin' on

ALBANY, N.Y. (AP)-The New York State Lottery, born in 1967 with blazing fanfare, has found living up to its billing a tough act to follow.

The lottery's gross income for this fiscal year is expected to show a drop of $5 million from last year's levels, lottery officials predict.

The decline is coming in spite of an energetic promotional campaign, special lotteries and more generous prize offerings.

New York lottery officials claim their experience with sagging sales is not unusual. But they do admit that many other state lotteries are outselling New York on a per capita basis. One lottery official called this aspect "disturbing." "All lotteries start off with a great deal of interest. They go great guns, but then they taper off and reach their own level," said Ted Aber, promotional director of New York State's lottery.

"We like to think that we have reached our own level," Aber said.

Sagging ticket sales have prompted the New York program to resort to what one lottery official called "specials and promotional jazz" to maintain buyer interest.

The nation's second state lottery-New Hampshire was first began as a monthly affair, and later followed New Jersey's lead into the 50-cent weekly lottery business. State officials are now considering a daily lottery to compete with the illegal numbers rackets.

The New York lottery has grown from a $50 million a year operation to a business that brought in $121 million in the last fiscal year. But state officials admit that their promotional specials and not the basic lottery keep the money flowing in.

Sales of weekly 50-cent tickets have been averaging 3.5 million, according to Aber's figures. The owner of a winning ticket can receive up to $50,000 or as little as $2.50. The specials usually run from six to eight weeks and offer such prizes as $200 a week for the life of the winner.

The state first instituted the specials during 1970 in an attempt to stimulate sales in a year that saw the lottery's gross income drop by $3 million from 1969, officials said.

The specials worked; 1970 ended with a gross income of $70 million, an increase of more than $20 million, according to Aber.

But even the specials have trouble holding the buyer's interest, as New York State's experience shows. The first "Millionaire" special brought in $16.6 million, a figure that subsequent millionaire specials did not touch, Aber said.

One trouble state lottery officials report having is satisfying public expectations. Before the lottery was started in New York one high ranking state official predicted the program would bring in $360 million a year. Lottery officials now say every New Yorker would have to spend $1.50 a month on the lottery to meet that expectation.

Lottery officials say that predictions hung around the neck of the New York program "like a millstone." It was an impossible expectation, they maintain.

Aber said "novelty" keeps the lottery producing revenue, 45 per cent of which goes to education and 40 per cent goes to the holders of winning tickets.

Gov. Malcolm Wilson's proposed daily lottery would be designed to cut into the illegal numbers rackets and boost the lottery program. Wilson said the daily lottery would make the state program "more productive."

It's time to make everyone pay

As a result, the editors have decided to begin charging 5 cents per issue to all graduates effective Monday May 8, 1974. Collection boxes will be placed at distribution points of The Collegian for graudated to deposit a nickle as they pick up their Collegian.

Since there is no way to adequately segregate undergraduate from graduate students, we must rely on the honesty of all graduates who read the paper to either deposit a nickle in the collection boxes or not take a paper.

Theft of The Collegian will be reagrded as petty larceny and appropriate legal action will be sought.

This week, the newspaper's business staff will be arranging meetings with representatives of the faculty senate, the administration, and the heads of the two campus employees' unions to arrange for appropriate compensation for Collegians ready daily by those members of the campus community.

To take such action is clearly counter to our aims at servicing the entire community equally. We want faculty, administrators, staff and graduate students to read The Collegian. We seek their input in our editorial judgements, though we cannot offer them positions on our staff because we are chartered as a undergraduate newspaper.

We are compelled to take this action because we feel a moral obligation to our undergraduate sponsors to see that they are not being taxed for benefits others enjoy. In addition, paid circulation is an inevitable step being taken by college dailies around the country to increase revenue, foster editorial responsibility and independence, and pay for high quality news coverage by competent, well-equipped staff.

Ransom insurance anyone?

NEW YORK (AP) — The recent rash of abductions here and abroad has made ransom insurance one of the hottest and most expensive items on the insurance market.

No firm has tried to publicize ransom policies, yet many have received ransom business without asking for it.

"Many people are surprised that we offer kidnaping insurance, but right now we need all the time we have just to work on the requests we're getting," one insurance manager said.

"Most of the action is in domestic insurance, but we're still giving quotes on foreign coverage which is always a problem for companies," he said.

And as the insurance companies are asked to cover more and more clients, prices have risen along with the number of kidnaping incidents.

Help is there for Black health care

STORRS, Conn. (AP) — Two-year colleges could supply the medical specialists needed to remedy second-rate medical care large segments of the black community are now receiving, say two University of Connecticut professors.

Health care is a primary need of the black population and the two year institutions are major resources for preparing and developing the needed personnel, say Dr. Fred Adams, dean of the School of Allied Health Professions, and Dr. Joseph Grant, a professor of education.

The barriers to health careers exclude the black and the poor, the professors said.

"Effective educators for black students at the two-year college level must include an educational plan...for expanding black students' horizons in terms of career selection," the educators said.

"Such choices relate to black community needs," the authors said in an article in the current issue of Community and Junior College Journal.

This is your key to unprecedented calculating capacity. Only Hewlett-Packard offers it.

It lets you "speak" to your calculator with total consistency, because it lets you load data into a 4-Register Stack. This means: (1) you always enter and process your data the same way, no matter what your problem; (2) you don't have to re-enter data; (3) you can see all intermediate data anytime.

Our HP-45 is one of two pre-programmed scientific pocket-sized computer calculators with this key. That's one reason it's the most powerful pre-programmed pocket-sized scientific computer calculator. Here are three of many others:

1. It's pre-programmed to handle 44 arithmetic, trigonometric and logarithmic functions and data manipulation operations beyond the basic four (+, −, ×, ÷).

2. It lets you store nine constants in its nine Addressable Memory Registers, and it gives you a "Last X" Register for error correction or multiple operations on the same number.

3. It displays up to 10 significant digits in either fixed-decimal or scientific notation and automatically positions the decimal point throughout its 200-decade range.

Our HP-35 is the other. It handles 22 functions, has one Addressable Memory Register and also displays up to 10 digits in either fixed-decimal or scientific notation. It's the second most powerful pre-programmed pocket-sized scientific computer calculator.

Both of these exceptional instruments are on display now. If you're looking for unprecedented calculating capacity for your money, by all means see and test them.

Drowning victims

TURNERS FALLS (AP) — About a dozen firefighters and volunteers continued searching yesterday for the body of a seven-year-old girl missing and presumed downed in an industrial canal since Saturday.

The girl was Linda Wickline, 7, of Turners Falls.

Her brother, Christian, 4, drowned Saturday in the 40 foot deep canal after a van-type truck they were in plunged into the canal.

The boy's body was recovered shortly after the accident and the van was pulled out on Saturday night.

Authorities said the accident occurred when the children were sitting in the back seat of the van as it was parked in front of a home.

The van began to roll backwards down a hill, went through a wire guard fence and into the canal, owned by Western Massachusetts Electric Company.

The van floated for nearly 150 feet while the children waved and screamed from inside.

Their father, Stearl Wickline, and another man tried to grab the vehicle as it struck a bridge over the canal. But they could not hold onto it.

As the van hit the bridge, the left window and the windshield broke and the van filled with water and started to sink.

The boy's body floated to the surface and was recovered. When the van was pulled out Saturday evening, the girl's body wasn't in it.

A witness to the accident, Charles Devino of Greenfield, said he was driving up the hill when he saw the van rolling backwards with the children in it. He said he tried unsuccessfully to ram the van to stop it.

Attempt on Ford

HARTFORD (AP) — Charges against Joseph M. Shannon, 52, of New Haven, in a threat to kill Vice President Gerald R. Ford March 10, were dismissed in Boston yesterday, according to Asst. U.S. Atty. Jaye A. Whittier.

Whittier said the government decided not to prosecute the case by gave no reasons.

Shannon was freed on $1,000 bond.

Ford was in Boston to accept the Man of the Year Award from the Havard Young Republican Club.

Kennedy Jr. tests

BOSTON (AP) — Edward M. Kennedy Jr. was released yesterday from Children's Hospital Medical Center after the fourth in a series of treatments to prevent the recurrence of bone cancer.

A hospital spokesman said the treatments and tests, which began Friday, revealed no evidence of any recurrence or spread of the cancer.

Young Kennedy, 12, oldest son of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., has his right leg amputated above the knee last November to halt the spread of a rare form of bone cancer.

Lottery by mail

WASHINGTON (AP) — Rep. Paul Findley, R-Ill., says state agencies of Massachusetts, Michigan, New Jersey, Maryland and New Hampshire are breaking the law by sending lottery tickets and order forms through the mail.

Findley said yesterday he has proposed legislation which would allow the mailing of material concerning legal lotteries.

In a letter to Atty. Gen. William Saxbe, Findley complained that an Illinois resident had received lottery material from agencies of other states "in flagrant abuse of existing law."

He said "these states point up the need to change the postal statutes dealing with lottery related material."

He said the Justice Department had indicated it would not support his proposed changes in the postal statutes.

Missing Boy Scout

STRATTON, Vt. (AP) — Searchers found an 11-year-old boy scout from Delmar, N.Y., safe and apparently in good condition on snow-covered Stratton Mountain yesterday, the state police reported.

Lawrence Carroll had been missing since Saturday, when he apparently became separated from a group of scouts on a field trip at the mountain.

A rescue party made up of state policemen, officers from the Windham County Sheriff's office, scouts, volunteers, and members of local snowmobile clubs had joined in the search for the boy.

Smokers vs. non smokers: a daily battle

By PETER NELSON

The warm support that CEQ and MassPIRG have received are indicative of the concern that many students have for the problem of pollution. Nevertheless, our community is faced with a far more insidious form of air pollution than radiation leaks or sulfur dioxide. I am referring to the Almighty Butt, the cigarette.

Of the thousands of UMass students who are addicted to tobacco, many wish they could quit; the rest smoke because they "enjoy it". Virtually all are the products of Madison Avenue behavior modification techniques. That's right, behavior modification. To many, the term refers to something out of Clockwork Orange or perhaps some of the latest methods used to control criminals. By properly applying reinforcement or some aversive stimulus, it is possible to control the behavior of convicts. When it works they become law abiding citizens because they (quite literally) "want to". The technique used by Madison Avenue has the same psychological basis. By associating cigarettes with some strong reinforcer such as sex, money or popularity, it's possible to get people to smoke. Men who smoke are more rugged and masculine and have women with bright smiles and big breasts. Even the liberated women have come a long way, baby. And everyone can collect coupons which are good for Valuable Gifts.

Of course, social and environmental factors play an important role as well. But whatever the route, once the habit has been implanted in the individual, the cigarette itself becomes a reinforcer and not another cent of advertising money need be wasted on the smoker. He's hooked.

But what about the rest of us, the non-smokers? The smoker's lack of concern for the opinions of health authorities may be merely foolish, but his lack of concern for the non-smoker who sits next to him in class boarders on the criminal. Certainly a cigarette smoker has a right to do whatever he pleases to his own body, but there is a wealth of evidence that smoking is nearly as dangerous for other people in the vicinity as it is for the smoker.

When politely requested to do so, many smokers will refrain from lighting up, although some are obviously not too happy about it. Unfortunately I have encountered too many smokers who would rather fight than stop and the familiar Black Eye is as likely to appear on the face of the unwitting non-smoker who makes the request as it is on the face of the Tareyton fan. One stubborn but creative smoker I encountered had an interesting variation on the Doral "Taste Me" theme as he began chanting, "make me, make me" when I asked him to stop smoking. One woman responded by lecturing me on her civil liberties, even going so far as to quote the Bill of Rights and the Preamble to the Constitution. Incredible. A student in one of my classes told me to "stuff it" when I suggested that he not light his cigarette, I'm still not sure if he meant the suggestion or the cigarette. So far, none of these encounters have ever come to blows but the puffing continues unabated. Unless something is done the act of informing people that you "mind very much if they smoke", will go the way of all flesh, and we may spend the rest of our academic days wearing gas masks and peering at the blackboard through a blue haze.

I think it is time for non-smokers to assert themselves en masse and limit that unhealthy habit to areas where people who are concerned about the quality of their personal environment will not be affected. To some extent this has been done in a few of the dining commons but some smokers ignore the signs and I saw one small no-smoking sign even being used as an ashtray. There are no-smoking sections in some of my classes and a few classes have banned smoking outright, but in other classes, especially where the teacher smokes, the fate of non-smokers is not so pleasant. What is needed is a University-wide recognition of the people's right to breathe clean air, and a means of maintaining this right. If there are those who think that the issue of smoking is too minor to bother with, I can only say that our inability to deal with the "minor" day-to-day problems would not speak well for the possibility of solving problems of a national or global nature.

Letters to the editor

No sour grapes

To The Editor:

Four years ago the United Farmworkers (AFL-CIO) negotiated their first contracts with the management of California agricultural corporations. Those contracts were a major breakthrough for the workers trying to overcome the oppression of the growers who employ them. Nevertheless, the struggle continues, workers still live in substandard housing, are poisoned by improper use of pesticides, and die at a rate three times that of the national average. Workers' children are still forced to work in the fields because of the low wages paid to the laborers. Labor contractors continue to exploit those they do the "service" of hiring by deducting up to 22 per cent of the worker's pay for that service and by providing housing, transportation, food and tools at inflated prices for workers who are not allowed into town to shop for themselves, often because they are of Mexican and not Anglo heritage.

The United Farmworkers' Union, the unanimous choice of the workers, is organizing workers in an effort to overcome the racist discrimination that has resulted in their lower social status. The Union, the workers' only chance, has tried to fight for the workers' demands by going on strike and setting up picket lines at the fields. Nevertheless, although the strikes have been up to 90 per cent effective for short periods of time, they have had to be called off because of the danger to the strikers. Two men have already been killed, many others injured on pickets of scab fields. The strike has been moved from the hands of the workers to those of the consumers and now it is up to us, as the citizens who make up the market for lettuce, table grapes and wines, to fight for the rights of workers.

Last fall, recognizing the need for support of the U.F.W. in this area, members of the Committee on Poverty, organized the Juan de la Cruz Boycott Committee. Since that time the committee has been responsible for picket lines at several chain stores resulting in chain wide committments in support and recognition of the UFW from Stop & Shop, Finast, Food Mart and Big-Y-Jumbo. Committee members have given teach-ins to classes, community groups and dormitory residents. Money has been raised to support the strike fund for those workers who are unable to find other work during the strike.

Despite the committee's effectiveness so far, more student support is needed. The strike will be reaching a crucial point in the next few months as contracts are being signed and as the growing season begins again. Students are needed to support us on picket lines, on delegations to stores, with letters to the management of scab stores and with the boycott of all table grapes, all non-union western lettuce and all Gallo, Guild and Franzia wines.

In black...

To The Editor:

In response to Nilsson's question (Friday, March 22) "Is the accusatory rhetoric by some members of the black community itself a form of racism?"

I do not look at this as a form of racism but rather a way of making the white community aware of the practice of institutional racism.

Many whites who are accused of being racist or of committing racist acts are probably not aware that their behavior is racist. This is the fault of our white society which has deeply imbedded racial stereotypes into our subconscious since childhood.

Racism whether conscious or unconscious is a problem created by whites and only whites can change the racist structures existing in our present society.

White Americans must realize the need to deal with their racism and the speed of their realization is dependent upon the constant firing of, what was termed, "accusatory rhetoric by some members of the black community" at the white community.

Katherine Bachelder

...and white

To The Editor:

Seldom does a day pass that an aspiring Black-radical does not level an unsubstantiated charge of racism at some group or institution on the UMass campus. In my opinion most (if not all) of these charges are originated by insecure individuals who view every slight, real or imagined, as an act of overt racism.

More ways than one

To The Editor:

In re: Reply to Barbara Voorhees editorial on "Good students don't do that" in the March 20, 1974 Collegian.

I agree with Ms. Voorhees in almost every respect. I only disagree partially with her statement that "Students will do anything for...good grades..." It is true that some students (all hear-say) have attempted to perform one or more of the following items to improve their grades:

1. begging for a better grade
2. compulsive nail biting
3. extreme deviation of eyeballs during examinations
4. coital relations with professor
5. zoophylic relations with professor's pet
6. psychosomatic disease
7. professor hating
8. psychoneurotic disease
9. attempted suicide
10. counter phobic machanism.

I suggest that they replace the above mentioned gimmicks with the following list:

1. study.

We were unplugged

To The Editor:

I would like to apologize for the technical difficulties to all those listening to last Saturday's NIT basketball broadcast on WMUA. During the UMass vs. Jacksonville game our line was "unplugged" by New York Bell Telephone with 8:31 to go in regulation time. The broadcast that Gerry Brooks and I did went on without any Bell Telephone or Madison Square Garden official notifying us of what had happened.

The technical engineers that accompanied our crew were highly competent in their field (Gary McAuliffe and Tom Jodka) and assured us that nothing was wrong throughout the second half (as far as they knew). In listening to the tape of the game, to try and figure out the nature of the problem, all that could be heard was the sound of a phone hanging up, 15 seconds of dead air and finally a dial tone. The fans back in Amherst were robbed of over 13 minutes of action while us two were sitting in the press box talking to our microphones. Ma Bell pulled the plug mistakingly and irresponsibly for no apparent reason in our most important broadcast of the year.

WMUA Sports has taken pride in doing what we feel is a professional job and this occurrence was unquestionably embarrasing and indicative of a minor league operation. If you were one of the several thousand listeners, let me assure you that it wasn't our fault and further conclude that when the bill arrives from New York Bell, they won't receive a penny.

Unreliable

The following letter was sent to UMass by a recent graduate.

To The Editor:

On about the seventh of last month I sent a request for transcript to your office. I asked that you send a copy of my transcript to a certain official of the city government of Worcester, Massachusetts, by the twenty-first of the month, when I was scheduled to interview there.

As I might have expected, you failed me. No transcript had been received by the date specified.

Your poor performance is quite typical of the "services" one can expect to receive at the University of Massachusetts. Lost applications and fouled-up records seem to [illegible] of life with you people. The problems are probably caused by an overblown bureaucracy on one hand, and the personnel simply not giving a damn on the other.

I remind you that most of us attend universities with the goal of getting a better job. You can have the highest possible scholastic standards, but if you screw up alumni in their job search, you have failed to do your job as an institute of higher education.

I am now asking that you send a copy of my transcript to me. I will Xerox it and send it myself to prospective employers, as you can't be depended upon.

Thanks.

Sincerely,
Michael A. Kirsch, '73

The arrogant elite

Saturday night Vice-President Ford called the people from CREEP "an arrogant elite guard of political adolescents." Shades of Spiro Agnew. A Vice-President is on the loose again, hopefully minus golf clubs this time, but now he's an attacker of the heathen, rather than a defender.

The Vice-President was almost right. The CREEPs were an "arrogant, elite guard." Almost right, because they weren't "political adolescents."

They were political sophisticates, operators trained in best tradition of post-Eisenhower politics, masters of their craft.

It's easy to blame them for Watergate, and Watergate-related symtoms. They're handy, obvious, easy to understand and perfect scapegoats.

But the blame isn't really that easy to place. Ford, being a good politician, can't really be expected to place it where it belongs, either. You don't call your constituents dopes and stay in office too long.

But it's the dopes who vote that should get the brunt of the blame.

When some people pointed to John Mitchell and said "He's a fascist with no scruples," they were told to "love America or leave it." Anything the government said, they believed. Now, it seems as though John Mitchell loved his country so much he's willing to go to jail for his beliefs.

And when the Presidential election came around two Novembers ago, a record number of dopes returned Richard Nixon to office.

Now, we're finding out that our President may not be the Sir Lancelot it seemed just 18 months ago. His beloved second-in-command, at one time a folk hero, is a common crook. His closest advisors are under criminal indictment, and referred to by his current second-in-command as "an arrogant elite guard of political adolescents." It looks like he's going to end up owing about $400,000 in back taxes because of illegal deductions.

But still the dopes love him.

The polls that show his popularity at all-time lows are shocking. It's not the figures, either, it's the fact that anyone in the nation would be stupid enough to still support him. It's unbelievable that a group of people could get together and raise money for his defense.

Still, when journalists point out his slipping credibility, his lusterless integrity, his repeated calls for speedy justice while he has to practically be put on a rack to cooperate with the Special Prosecutor, they are called, as I was in a letter from some noble person, "dirty, tricky gangsters."

Some folks just can't see the President as being human and capable of error. You can lead a horse to scandal, but you can't make him think.

The letters pour in, though, asking the press why they don't give the President a fair shake, why all the news about the White House is bad news.

Maybe it's because that's all there is.

Montreal Express

If there is any city on the North American Continent where I could very easily eat and drink myself to death, then it is surely Montreal. Last Monday night, on a whim and a few extra bucks, we boarded the midnight train for Montreal, from beautiful downtown Springfield. Put everything you've heard about the new Amtrak service aside, for here are the facts. First, the trains run on time, no credit to Mussolini for that one. The midnight is not an express, in the true sense, but why quibble, Graham Greene didn't. The ride takes about nine hours, and is very enjoyable considering. That "considering" means that we went coach fare, $31 for the two of us, and in the wee small hours it can get uncomfortable sleeping in your seat. But what the hell, if you want a berth, you can pay for one; but for such a short trip it's foolish. If you can sleep in airplane seats, then you'll have the most pleasant dreams of your life in the train seats. They're bigger, more leg room, and chances are you can stretch out on two seats. We'll bring a blanket the next time, though, it can get pretty chilly up around White Horse Junction. And if you're a boozer, or a coffee freak, take that along too, because the club car closes shop at about one A.M.

The dining car opens at six-thirty, and the breakfasts are reasonable, and served at a table with real silverware, and napkins, and glasses, etc. Forget the airplane, compared to Eastern this is first class all the way. The best part is imagining what it was like back in the 30's, just being on board is a nostalgia trip. I half expected to see Peter Lorre waddle into the car, white suit and all. There were no murders during the night, however, as far as I know anyway.

Customs, going into Canada, was a breeze. Be careful coming back though, it seems the U.S. officials take their jobs a bit more seriously than their Canadian counterparts. Expect to be asked more questions than usual if you tell them you're a student. Four or five people (not all students) were put off the train for some unknown reason. It's too bad, because the U.S. could probably benefit from anything brought home from Canada. If you're not a U.S. citizen, better check with Immigration before making the trip, in or out. I understand there's been some rules changed recently, making requirements a bit stiffer. At any rate it's annoying, but no problem if you've got your wits about you.

It's impossible to go into much detail about Montreal itself, it'd take forever. But there are certain impressions that just stay with you. It's definitely one of the most livable cities that I've ever seen. Clean, charming, both old and new, there's something for everyone. The Canadians take their work seriously, and are more than eager to help foreigners. Many of the small, but well appreciated services, lacking in so many U.S. cities, are a way of life in Montreal. Every Montrealer we came in contact with was bi-lingual, and it's charming. French is such a melodious language, I hated to ask that things be explained in English. The idea is to use the French whenever you can, it adds so much to the enjoyment.

The city is a gourmet's delight. I could not imagine eating any better, or more elegantly. Every restauranteur in Boston should take a little trip North, and learn the finer points of serving and preparing meals. With every movement the waiters and waitresses show their appreciation that you have chosen to eat at their establishment. The well known restaurants are superb, as advertised. You must eat at the Auberge Le Vieux St. Gabriel, in the old section of town. It is an old stone house, with as much history behind it as Bunker Hill. Paintings and tapestries adorn the walls, and you could spend an hour just poking around. The food is exquisite, and the service equally so. Definitely a must is the Cafe de Paris, in the Ritz Carlton Hotel. Now don't let that scare you, the bill was not overly expensive, and the food was not to be surpassed. During the day we would stop in at some out of the way restaurants, and the food was always superb, (and cheaper during those hours).

The Montreal night life is fabulous, expensive, and worth it. Discotheques are definitely in, but the genuine number, not the Boston or New York version. And if Discos aren't your thing, there's a million other places to go. It seems that the city never closes, last call in one nightclub that we went to was four-thirty...that's A.M. If there's anything that turns me on to a town, it's being able to buy a drink, or order a meal, at just about any hour. The Blue Laws be damned, it's the only way to live.

Some tips if you go...The good old U.S. dollar is worth less than Canadian money, and I can imagine it hurts like hell if you're cashing in a load of dough. Buy a round trip ticket on Amtrak or you'll have no incentive whatsoever to come back to the U.S., let alone Amherst. Be prepared to tip for services provided, but not as extravagantly as in New York. Ride on the Metro, and you'll never ride on the MBTA again. All in all a great time, especially for those of us who are dying to get to Europe, but haven't the bread. The Montrealers actually seem to be enjoying life, a thing quite rare this side of the border. To hell with Nixon, and the Plumbers, and Watergate, and all the rest of it. Scrape your pennies together and get on board, for a few carefree days that I guarantee you won't soon forget, or want to either.

Collegian not racist

By STEVE TRIPOLI

You know, there have been a lot of hassles between the Collegian and the black community in the years that I've been associated with the paper. The latest encounter, highlighted by a front page story entitled "Blacks protest Collegian, issue statement" is much the same thing as what the paper has encountered in the past. I won't pretend to speak for anyone but myself here, but there are some serious errors in perception that I notice in the statement from "Corp." which appeared in the March 20th edition which I feel should not go unchallenged. I'll deal with them in the order in which they appeared in the statement.

1) '...the Collegian has always been a racist newspaper reflecting the closed views of White America."

This is not only worthless as rhetoric, it is dangerous in that it is divisive. The generalities are grotesque, highlighted by the assumption that all of white America is racist. I seriously doubt that even the authors believe their assertions about the Collegian and the rest of the nation. If they do, then I can assure them that they don't have much company, in or out of the black community.

2) "We recognize the fact that the Collegian is run by white students whose interest is diametrically opposed to that of black students."

A naive assumption which again can only be a catalyst for conflict. The statement assumes that no white person can share in the interests of the oppressed. It's also ridiculous in that the authors do not know the Collegian staff on a personal basis. To make such a heavy accusation, one should at least know who he-she is talking about.

Statements one and two are both disappointing in that they represent the kind of baseless, emotional appeal that is better suited to demagogues and hard core racists. There's some question in my mind at this point as to where the racism resides in the Corp. statement.

3) (In reference to the Southern University killings) "The Collegian did not think it necessary to react with the degree of intensity...as they did during the Kent State killing."

It should be remembered that Kent State took place during an unprecedented and since unmatched wave of student activism. Political awareness was high, protest was at a fever pitch. Out of the frenzy came bullets, death, and big coverage. In most any other circumstance the argument for racism would be valid. In this case, it isn't.

4) "When C.C.E.B.S. had their banquet on October 20th the Collegian refused to cover the event. 'We don't have anyone to cover it,' was their reply."

I might add that this was a reply heard by more than one dismayed group worthy of coverage in the last few years. The Collegian is perpetually understaffed — it's a fact of life. Coverage is promised on a first come, first served basis for newsworthy events. To say that lack of staff constitutes a refusal to cover Third World news displays a lack of knowledge of the Collegian's operation and problems.

I'll skip a few more examples for the sake of brevity and get to the heart of the argument. For a case in point let's use the now infamous McGilvray cartoon. Anyone who knows Don McGilvray will tell you that he is not a racist, but let's assume for the purposes of this argument that Don's cartoon was willfully and maliciously racist. The answer to that, in truly responsible journalistic (and moral) terms is simply So What? Anyone has the right to advocate anything in what they write (or draw) as opinion. That can run the spectrum from the legalization of marijuana to the liquidation of a race. I may feel someone is a crazy and-or sick bastard for their views, but they are entitled to them. No one anywhere has a snowball's chance in hell to be truly free if anyone else is shut off.

As for the threatened action to be taken by Corp. against the Collegian, my advice is for the paper to resist all attempts at outside control. The only way to get input in the paper is to get into the paper. Sporadic, every now and then demands for input can only be honored at the cost of the paper's credibility.

Frankly, I'm kind of tired of people trying to exploit the good intentions of the Collegian with pressure tactics. Confronted with similar tactics I cannot say how I would have reacted. Each person can only deal with that when the time comes. I'm fairly sure I could have followed my own advice. If I hadn't been able to, my worth as a person would have declined to the point where I would have felt compelled to resign. I only hope that the Collegian's present leadership can meet the challenge. An extremely important principle depends on it.

UMass tuition could soar

For the people

question of funding public education. "I would like to see more research on higher education in the state," the legislator added.

O'Brien conceded that if a bill such as his was passed, the private colleges would indirectly benefit because students attending them would receive more of the money the state directs towards education.

Passage of a bill such as 1770 would unquestionnably benefit private college students — and, as some would argue — at the expense of the state and community colleges. By law, 75 per cent of all state scholarship funds must go to students attending private colleges. This would mean that 75 per cent of the scholarship monies that the state raised through O'Brien's bill would have to go to private college students.

Rep. Charles W. Long of Dover is sponsoring a bill that would bring about a $2,000 tuition at UMass, the state and community colleges. Certain deductions would be allowed, so that students from low-income families would pay far less than $2,000. Students from extremely poor families would probably pay a nominal fee. (At press time, Rep. Long could not be contacted for comment on his legislation.) The bill is House no. 1196.

The Senate and House Chairmen of the Education Committee — Sen. Walter J. Boverini (D-Lynn) and Rep. Michael J. Daly (D-Boston) both said that the Committee would most definitely issue an unfavorable report on the bills. Both legislators were opposed to the bills.

Sen. Bovernini said he doubted that the House would overturn an unfavorable Committee report on the bills. By not overturning an adverse report, the House would effectively be killing the bills — for this year. The Lynn Senator also pointed out the the Board of Trustees of the state colleges were the ones who have been setting the tuition rates.

Rep. Daly also stated his belief that the bills would not pass this year. But, Daly added that next year "could be a different story." The Boston legislator added that the schools' Board of Trustees — and not the Legislature — should continue to set the tuition rates.

Speaker of the House David M. Bartley (D-Holyoke) also told the Collegian that neither bills would pass this year. "There bills tax those who can least afford to pay it," the House Speaker said.

Locally, Sen. John W. Olver (D-Amherst) and Rep. James G. Collins (D-Amherst) have expressed their opposition to the bills. Sen. Olver believes the state should work towrds a graduated income tax and no tuition for public higher education; Rep. Collins is a graduate of UMass-Amherst and will work towards defending the freedom of public education.

Strong opposition to both bills was voiced before the Committee on Education by more than 200 students who jammed a public hearing in the State House last Thursday.

"This is another example of the rich getting richer and the poor getting poorer," Joseph A. Langis, President of the senior class at Boston State College, told the Committee. "If tuition is raised at public colleges, the only benefactor would be private schools."

William P. Haas, associate director of academic affairs for the Mass. State College system, said the state's low tuition made higher education more accesible to low and middle income families.

"We have found that 50 per cent of our students come from families where the income is less than $10,500," Haas said. "Twenty percent come from families earning less than $7,500 annually."

Haas said 65 per cent of the students in the state college system are the first in their families to go to college.

"For a family of limited or exhausted resources," he added, "the decision to attend college is a difficult one and each factor of uncertainty adds to the potential discouragement."

Mose Davis of the Africa Students' Ass'n. at Boston State told the Committee the proposed tuition increases would hurt veterans. When you're a veteran," he adds, "you're only allowed 'x' dollars to go to school. If school costs more, you have to make up the difference yourself."

Bernadette Murphy of the Boston State College Coalition, a group of students and faculty members, called the proposal tuition hikes "ridiculous" and "an attack on working class students."

A member of the Student Advisory Committee to the Board of Trustees group, Eric Straughter, opposed tuition increases saying they would make it more difficult for minority persons to enter the state college system.

Concerned

Are you concerned about possible skyrocketing tuitions at public educational institutions? If you're a UMass student - particularly a freshman or sophomore - you could be directly affected by the tuition crisis during the next two or three years.

This Thursday evening (April 4) at 9:30 p.m. UMass students concerned about the future funding of UMass, state, and community colleges will be meeting to discuss possible action. ("The sight of the meeting is not yet determined).

There is the possibility that local legislators will be attending Thursday's meeting. More information on the meeting will be printed later this week.

Rep Collins lists finances

State Rep. James G. Collins (D-Amherst) recently issued the following statement as part of his regular newsletter to the district--

"As I promised when first seeking office a year and one-half ago, I would like to present the constituents of the 2nd Hampshire District with a full accounting of my personal financial assets and liabilities. I shall continue, as a matter of individual belief, to present such an accounting each year I remain in public life."

"I devote full time to my position as State Representative; thus my only salaried income for 1973 was $12,027 paid to each legislator. In addition, I received $957 in severance pay from the University of Mass. when I resigned my position at the University upon taking office. I rent half my home on Butterfield Terrace and received, after expenses, an additional $1200 in 1973. Thus, my total income for 1973 was $14,184.

The value of my home at 67 Butterfield Terrace, Amherst is $35,000. The value of my automobile, a 1972 Plymouth, furnishings, and other property add up to $4500. Liabilities include $29,191 for my home mortage and personal care note. Thus, my total assets for 1973 were $11,308.

My traveling and business expenses as State Rep. for 1973 will be approximately $5700, while I was reimbursed $4780 by the state ($20day for travel, lodging, meals, and incidentals each day the Legislature is in session and $100 per mo.for general business expenses.) Thus, my business expenses exceeded reimbursements by $920.

My 1972 campaign for State Rep. cost approximately $3740 which was raised by direct mail campaign of small contributions. After the campaign expenses were paid, $4.00 remains in my campaign treasury.

THIS FRIDAY, April 5 Rep. Collins will be in the UMass Campus Center from 9 to 11 a.m. If you have any comments, questions, or suggestions about state government or political issues, stop in and see the local legislator. Rep. Collins holds office hours at UMass the first Friday of every month in the CC from 9-11 a.m.

Four-year terms?

FOUR-YEAR TERMS.....Massachusetts legislators would serve four-year terms of office under a bill being considered by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Rep. Kenneth M. O'Brien (D-Southbridge) filed the proposal for a constitutional amendment to provide the expanded terms for Senators and Representatives.

Presently, both Senate and House members serve two-year terms.

Rep. O'Brien filed the measure, he says, because "it is virtaully impossible to present any organized program in the Legislature under the present length of office, especially for freshmen legislators.

"The first year you're learning the ropes and the second year you're running for re-election."

The Representative points out that the Legislature is now working with a four-year Executive branch. He contends it would be easier for the Legislature to work with Governors' programs if legislative members also served four-year terms.

The governor and lieutenant governor have been elected to four-year terms since 1966.

In order to be adopted, the proposal must be approved by two consecutive Legislatures sitting in joint convention and must be accepted by the people in referendum.

ANIMAL DRUGS.....A bill prohibiting the administration of drugs to animals in pulling contests has been initially approved by the House of Representatives.

The bill authorizes the state commissioner of agriculture to take siliva or urine tests of the animals to determine the presence of drugs. Pulling contests are held at agricultural fairs throughout the state.

Legal referral services sponsored by Massachusetts Bar Association

BOSTON (AP) — The Massachusetts Bar Association will establish a statewide lawyer referral service to increase availability of regular legal advice for those who don't have attorneys, it was announced Saturday.

The association said the referral service would become operational today with a toll-free telephone line into its Boston headquarters.

Frederick G. Fisher Jr., president of the 8,800-member state association, said that under the program, persons with legal problems can call the service and be referred for an appointment to an attorney in their community who has experience in a particular area of law.

Persons referred under the plan will be charged "reasonable fees" for the initial interview with the attorney, Fisher said, and if any additional work is necessary, the client and attorney will agree upon a fee.

The association said about 200 attorneys already have qualified for the service and additional applications were being processed.

The phone number for the service in the Boston area is 523-4529, and elsewhere in Massachusetts is 1-800-392-6164.

The impeachment debate

Indictable offense not necessary: Conte

Over a month ago, THE COLLEGIAN asked U.S. Rep. Silvio O. Conte (R-Pittsfield) to define "what is an impeachible offense" for his student constituents at UMass. Here is the statement, received from his Washington office Friday. Conte was not asked to take a stand on the impeachment of President Nixon as a particular case.

I would like to preface my remarks by emphasizing that impeachment is not a finding of guilt. It is merely a decision by the majority of the House of Representatives that sufficient evidence exists to justify a trial by the Senate.

It is my considered opinion--and I've done a lot of reading and research on this issue--that the Constitution's "high crimes and misdemeanors" basic for impeachment includes acts which may not be subject to criminal indictment if those acts tend to subvert to a substantial degree our Constitutional institutions and form of government.

Because impeachment is a process under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Congress, there have been no definitive definitions of impeachable offenses handed down by the Supreme Court. In order to determine what the founding fathers had in mind when they wrote the impeachment provisions into the Constitution, we have to rely on history.

It is undisputed that impeachment has its origins in English law and practice and that our founding fathers were pretty well steeped in English history.

Since 1386, when the Earl of Suffolk was impeached for misapplication of federal funds, the concept of impeachment has been imbedded in English law. In 1642, the lord mayor of London was impeached for refusing to follow Parliament's order to store arms in city warehouses. In 1680, a Chief Justice was impeached for dismissing a grand jury before it could take action against "Papists." Other officers of the crown were impeached for giving bad advice to the King, advocating what Parliament considered unwise peace terms, alienating the King from Parliament, isolating the King from other advisers, and, in one instance, giving medicine to the King without the advice of a physician.

All of this does not mean that these acts, some of which were relatively frivolous, could be the basis for impeachment in the United States. But their appearance in the historical record establish the fact the English practice of "impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors" was not predicated on criminal acts in the traditional sense.

We have to look to early American history to determine to what degree the English precedents were intended to be carried over into American Constitutional law.

When the framers of the Constitution met in Philadelphia in 1787, James Madison, the principal architect of the Constitution, told the convention that it was "undespensible that some provision be made for defending the community against the incapacity, negligence or perfidy of the chief magistrate." He argued: "The limitation on the period of (the President's) service was not a sufficient security. He might lose his capacity after his appointment. He might pervert his administration into a scheme of peculation or perversion. He might betray his trust to foreign powers."

While Madison used terms such as "negligence", "perfidy", and "perversion", later events in the drafting of the Constitution clearly indicate that he and the other framers did not consider any acts of negligence or breach of trust to be impeachable.

The impeachment clause was amended to make "malpractice or neglect of duty" grounds for a president's removal. George Mason then made a motion that the clause be expanded to include "maladministration." Madison then objected, saying "So vague a term will be equivalent to a tenure during the pleasure of the Senate."

At that point, George Mason proposed and the convention accepted the phrase, "high crimes and misdemeanors."

Looking at the history of American impeachments since that time, we can draw a conclusion that an impeachable offense need not be an indictable crime, but it must be a substantial affront to the American system and its principles.

In 1797, the House voted, for the first time, articles of impeachment against Tennessee Senator William Blount, accusing him of plotting with England to overthrow Spanish control of territories located in what is now Florida and Louisiana. In that case, Rep. James Bayard, one of the House managers or prosecutors, argues, "There may be cases appropriate for the exercise of the power of impeachment where no crime or misdemeanor has been committed."

In 1912, the House impeached and the Senate convicted federal judge Robert Archibald for exerting improper influence over litigants, even though the House managers acknowledged that Archibald's activities "were not intrensically wrong, and would have been blameless if committed by a private citizen."

In the early 1800's, the House impeached and the Senate convicted Judge John Piskering who was a senile, profane drunkard. But the Senate acquitted Justice Samuel Chase who invited the disfavor of President Jefferson and his Party by delivering anti-Jefferson harangues to juries.

The above historical view on the bases for invoking impeachment proceedings in fact has been upheld in the overwhelming majority of cases where the courts have ruled on the constitutional nature of impeachable offenses.

Even when assuming the responsibilities of Office, the President is sworn to uphold the Constitution and the laws of the land. Any serious failure to do so quite logically subjects the President to impeachment removal, as provided by Article II, Section 4, of the Constitution - whether or not the offense committed constitutes one so serious as to be indictable in a court of law.

Failure to allow this basis for impeachment removal of the President would defy logic and the integrity of the Constitutional process, since then the President could, upon assuming Office, for four years simply do nothing; offer no legislation; appoint no Presidential officers or executives; disburse no monies appropriated; simply not act -- as long as he committed no serious crime.

Of course, I fully realize that for there to be a breach or shortcoming so serious as to be of a constitutional nature, the offense both ought to be substantial and of grave constitutional processes, or of the separation of powers established by the Constitution.

Mere social or protocol breaches, or violations involing personality abuse, objectional manners of operation, disclosures of confidances, or the like - however serious these sometimes appear ought not to be offenses for which under the Constitution the President may be impeached.

In conclusion, while I do not hold the view that simple misunderstandings, social improprieties, frivolous conduct, or the like subject the President to impeachment removal under the Constitution, it is equally clear to me that no provision of the Constitution defining impeachable offenses requires that an offense, were it not the President involved, would be indictable in a court of law.

Police supported in brutality case

The issue of alleged police brutality in a confrontation between an Amherst policeman and town resident Joseph Rock last month was settled last week by selectmen.

The board accepted a report by Town Manager Allen Torey recommending support for the policy actions.

Charges were brought by Rock at selectmen meeting by Marion Rock, who demanded the resignation or suspension of five Amherst police for allegedly beating her son, Joseph outside the Rustic Roost on North Pleasant Street February 10.

The board has proposed new guidelines to establish a formal process for dealing with citizen complaints about police brutality in Amherst.

A large group gathered at the Selectmens' meeting last Monday to hear disposition of the case by the selectmen. The board decided to postpone any testimony and accept Torrey's report.

School reform election stymied

BOSTON (AP) — The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court is expected to decide Monday whether to allow the city of Boston to go ahead with an election scheduled for Tuesday on school committee reform.

State Sen. Joseph F. Timilty, D-Boston, has asked the court to call off the election on the grounds of an error in a law that calls for the election.

The election, if it occurs as scheduled, will be to choose one of four plans for changing the structure of the Boston School Committee. Whichever plan is chosen will be offered to city voters next November as an alternative to the present school committee structure.

Timilty asked for the injunction last Friday and the court agreed to hear the case Monday.

The dispute revolves around the school committee's fiscal autonomy, that is, whether its year-to-year budget can be cut by the mayor and city council. As it stands now, the budget cannot be cut below the previous year's level.

Timilty says one of the four plans was to have preserved this fiscal autonomy. He says everybody involved had agreed on that but somehow that provision was left out of the legislation that called for Tuesday's special election.

Over the weekend, Major Kevin White accused Timilty of "monumental incompetence" in connection with the bill.

"It was Timilty who was floor manager of the bill, who voted for it without having read it, who shepherded through the Senate a bill that did the opposite of what he intended," said White.

Timilty responded that city corporation counsel Herbert Gleason was responsible and will have to answer before the court.

Supreme Judicial Court Justice Edward Hennessey has scheduled a hearing on the request for Monday morning.

Nuclear plant challenged

WASHINGTON (AP) — The record of the Nixon administration in education was attacked Saturday by spokesmen for the Democratic leadership in Congress.

Responding to an address on education delivered by President Nixon last week, Rep. John Brademas, D-Ind., and Sen. Claiborne Pell, D-R.I., said the President's role has been one of opposition to programs put forward by Congress.

"With only a few exceptions, President Nixon has shown no willingness to wotk together with Congress to strengthen our schools and colleges and improve our system of education," said Brademas, the chief deputy Democratic whip, in a nationwide radio broadcast.

Pell, chairman of the Senate Education subcommittee, said in a separate radio address that the five years of the Nixon administration have been marked by "constant struggle with the administration as the Congress has sought to give greater priority to education."

Reps hassled by anti-death

By GUY DARST
Associated Press Writer

BOSTON (AP) — Public reaction to the anti-death penalty stand of 15 state senators ranges widely.

Two of the 15 are under particularly heavy constituent pressure to switch their votes upholding the governor's veto of a bill that would require the death penalty for nine kinds of murder.

One of those, Sen. Stephen J. McGrail, a freshman Democrat from Wakefield, may switch his vote. His change would not mean passage of the bill if the other 14 stand fast, as they say they will.

The other senator under heavy pressure, Sen. Joseph F. Timilty, D-Boston, seems firm in his stand.

McGrail has scheduled a news conference for 11 a.m. Monday at the State House to announce his decision. He said Friday the decision would be based on a weekend tour of his district.

McGrail said Friday he had received more than 100 calls running about 10-1 in favor of the death penalty bill. "My problem is my conscience says one thing; the people are saying something else - you should carry our message on Beacon Hill."

There seemed no organized campaign and only one policeman had called. "It's my workers, my friends and people who donated to my campaign who are calling," he said. He thought the recent killing of a bystander in a holdup attempt in his district had sensitized his constituents to the issue.

Timilty said he received at least 200 calls and another 100 were taken by his wife. Presure will not change his mind, he said, only proof that the death penalty deters murder and proof the bill is constitutional - two proofs he called "not likely."

"I link my stand directly to my stand against abortion. The callers understand that," he said.

The calls to the other senators vary from "a large number of vicious, obscene and anonymous calls" reported by Sen. Chester G. Atkins, D-Acton, to "maybe six or seven, evenly divided" to Sen. James A. Kelly Jr., D-Oxford.

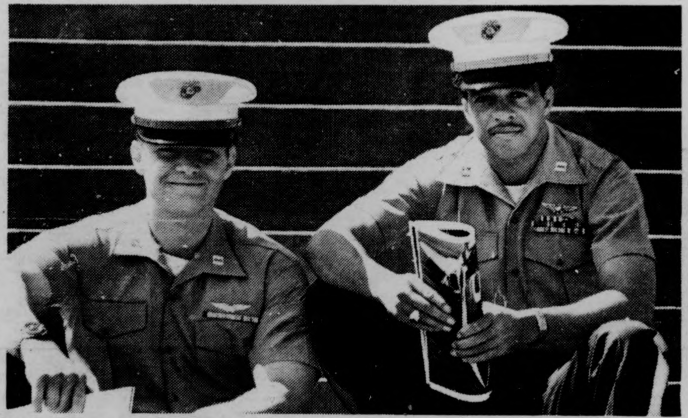
We challenge you.



Our Officer Selection Officers are looking for a few good college men—maybe 3 out of 100—who will make good Marine officers. If you're one of them, we'll give you a chance to prove it during summer training at Quantico, Virginia.

Our program is Platoon Leaders Class, PLC. With ground, air and law options. You might even qualify for up to $2,700 to help you through college. But if money is all you're looking for, don't waste your time.

The challenge is leadership. If you want it, work for it. If you've got it, show us. It's one hell of a challenge. But we're looking for one hell of a man.

Black music study

Trumpeter-composer Jimmy Owens will give a lecture-demostration on Black Music in America tomorrow night in the Emily Dickinson Lounge of the Orchard Hill Residential College. The presentation will be in two parts: at 7:30 p.m. Mr. Owens will lead a discussion on the Business Aspects of Black Music and at 9 p.m. Mr. Owens will perform with a local rhythm section led by John Betsch of the UMass Jazz Workshop. The event is being sponsored by the Orchard Hill Music Series and the Orchard Hill course, "Anthology of African American Music" taught by bassist Reggie Workman.

Mr. Owens is one of the founders and is involved in Collective Black Artists of New York, a group which according to him, is "attempting to educate the listener and the musician to how important the music has been, is, and will be in all aspects of life: emotional, spiritual, business, and creative." Outside of his activities with CBA, Mr. Owens is a member of the Music Panel of the National Endowment for the Arts and also the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences (NARAS).

He has performed all over the world with such artists as Count Basie, Duke Ellington, Charles Mingus, the New York Jazz Sextet, and the Billy Taylor Orchestra featured on the David Frost Show. Mr. Owens has recorded over fifty albums with other artists and two others under his own leadership. He has either performed or recorded with the three Bl[illegible] Musicians on this campus, Max Roach, Archie Shep[illegible] Reggie Workman. Mr. Owens is presently enrolled in the doctoral program at UMass, majoring in education and aesthetics. He has a unique dedication and commitment to the understanding of Black Music as the art from it truely is. Both facets of this program are free.

Daniels case aired

AMHERST — Tonight at 10 p.m., WMUA (UMass radio, 91.1 FM) will air a discussion on the unusual case of Russell Daniels, a 28-year-old retarded black man who was convicted last year of murdering an elderly woman in Springfield, and who was later sentenced to life imprisonment in Norfolk State Prison — although his mental capacity was determined to be that of a nine-year-old child.

Tonight's program is being presented as a special feature of "Focus," WMUA's weekly public affairs series produced and moderated by Kenneth Mosakowski.

Mosakowski's guests for the live, 60-minute forum will be Sue Sherry, Ron Marro, Ted Smith, and Alto Daniels, who is the prisoner's brother.

Tonight's program is being timed to promote the showing on April 3rd of "A Nine-Year-Old in Norfolk Prison," an award-winning documentary on the Daniels case. The film will be shown in Mahar Auditorium at 8:00 p.m. Wednesday.

By EDIE WIEDER
MDC Columnist

QUESTION: Last year I took a course in the English Department and never completed a major assignment for the course. Although I had a high average, I took an Incomplete for the course planning to earn the letter grade during the summer. I never did get around to it and the "I" still remains on my transcript. I'm really not planning to complete the course. What will happen when I graduate? Will the Incomplete stand or will it be changed into an "F"?

ANSWER: According to the University DIRECTIONS booklet, you could have earned the credits for this course if you had completed the work within two weeks of the final exam. The inevitable exceptions to this deadline hinge upon whether or not you can prove to your instructor that you had contracted some incapacitating illness, were plagued with "critical personal problems," or needed more time due to "scholarly reasons."

Again, according to DIRECTIONS, "the initiative for removal of the incomplete grade rests with the student but faculty members giving an incomplete grade must be responsible for making suitable arrangements for its removal."

The meaning of this last line was made clear to me by Mr. Ralph Jones and Mrs. Markwell in the Records Office. Apparently, Whitmore is so backed up with problems of this sort that the two-week deadline is rarely enforced. In practice, a student has until the add deadline of the next semester to complete the course.

Your "I" may just remain an "I" until your instructor decides to change it. The Records Office is presently sending notices to all instructors who have submitted incompletes within the past two semesters to request them to inform Whitmore of their intentions concerning the future of the grade. If your prof responds to the memo and still remembers your name, the result will most likely be an "F" on your transcript.

If he-she fails to respond, the incomplete will stand even upon graduation. (Either way, you lose the credits for the course) It is ultimately the prof's move that counts in your case. The Records Office will change a grade only on the prof's recommendations so you might want to discuss this matter with him or her.

If you're unsatisfied with his-her decision, you can appeal to the dean of your college and possibly request a "retroactive withdrawal" which would be granted under the same conditions as a "late drop." According to Dean Shaw of CASIAC, these conditions would include severe medical, psychological, or financial problems which considerably hampered your studies, or, again, "scholarly reasons."

"Scholarly reasons" do not, however, include "mental blocks" against the subject matter. Even if your instructor supports you in this appeal, keep in mind that the decisive factor will be your persuasive and determined answer to the question, "Why didn't you complete the course?"

Drop me a line soon!

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

Magicians tell us it's fun to be fooled, but not to be deceived. The signs most amiable to jokes, gags, surprises are Gemini, Libra, Aquarius and Leo. Those capable of preparing the most elaborate April Fool maneuvers are Taurus, Virgo, Capricorn, Scorpio and Pisces. However, when chips are down, it seems all of us are really "expert" at fooling ourselves.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You appeal to more persons. Your product, personality finds wider range of acceptance. You are able to make constructive changes, to perform in creative manner. Special relationship is on brink of finish—or a new beginning.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Obstacles can become constructive challenges. Find new ways of achieving objective. Leo individual could figure prominently. Get rid of procedure which is outmoded, unwieldly and costly. Cumbersome maneuvers need not be a permanent part of your repertoire.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Relative who has been difficult to reach will be available. You are able to surmount communications gap. Trust inner feeling. You will know what to do and when to do it. Short trip could be on agenda.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Emphasis now is on collection, specifics concerning payments, budget and income. Be careful about apparent minor matters. If observant, you discover loophole. Protect interests. Compare and insist on quality. Don't sell yourself short.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Your position is stronger than might be apparent on surface. Know it and act in direct, confident manner. Question concerning opposite sex will be favorably resolved. What appears unwarranted delay will boomerang in your favor.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): You become more aware of details. You may be assigned to task behind the scenes. You gain prestige. You find what is real and discover what is sham. You experience a reawakening. Gemini could play significant role.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Accent is on wish fulfillment, romance, special arrangements involving friends. Income from business, professional endeavors is reviewed. Family member has something constructive to say about budget. Be receptive.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Emphasis is on career, business dealings, ultimate goals and standing in community. You find where you stand, chances for promotion. Pisces, Virgo individuals could figure prominently. Professional superior provides healthy challenge. Accept!

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): You are in touch with various elements. You perceive potential. You also add to knowledge. Correspondence can be more important than usual. Capricorn, Cancer persons may be in picture. Gather needed educational materials. Check postal rates.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Nothing occurs in lukewarm fashion. For you, it is all or nothing. Know it and don't start something you can't finish. Questions involving savings, investments, long-term arrangements arise. Partner, mate must be included in any decision.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): New horizons open. You can share with one close to you. Feeling of loneliness is replaced by belonging, affection, solid tie. Defer final decisions. Patience is ally now because time is on your side. Be aware enough to play shrewd waiting game.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Pacing is important. Study Aquarius message. Keep health, diet resolutions. Avoid lifting heavy objects. Act on logic, not impulse. One close to you does care—know it and stop brooding about nothing. Work load will be eased.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you are inventive, original, dynamic, independent and, occasionally, arrogant. Leo and Aquarius persons are drawn to your sphere of activity. September could be a key month for you during this, one of your most important years since 1965. You have leadership qualities and do best working for yourself rather than for others.

SEX WEEK SLOW AT U. ALA, in spite of the appearance of the editor of Screw Magazine and Linda Lovelace, star of "Deep Throat."

Sponsored by the University Program Council, the "week" was intended as "an opportunity for students to expose themselves to extremes of human sexuality."

The N.Y. Times has reported that "There have been protests from the religious community, but no pickets, no arrests and no censorship."

While the University administration maintained a low profile, they did approve the guarantee of $3,000 in student funds necessary to finance the "week."

CREDIT CARDS are filtering to the high school campuses. The school store at Scotch Plains (NJ) High has established its own system, at a fee of 50 cents per student.

A page one story in a recent Fanscotian, the campus newspaper, says that a condition of extending credit is the signature of parents on applications. When the store called them to verify, it discovered that of the first 30 applications received, 26 contained forged signatures.

But store officials are still confident that the system will teach the youngsters to be responsible about money matters.

of VA director Donald Johnson, a man not well-liked by the younger veterans, judging from the occasional outbursts of "Where's Johnson? Get Johnson in here!" which filled the room.

Due to the failure of the UMass Vets' Club to either organize special transportation or inform the body of the protestors on transportation, this reporter and about 25 vets were late for the hearing. However, we seemed only to have missed filibuster. Mr. Vaughn was reading off a list of statistics in a monotone to an apparently bored panel when Senator Hartke interrupted him to ask him to get to a point. A shout went up from the vets, "Yea, Quit the filibuster!"

Senator Hartke rapped for order, and then told Mr. Vaughn, "If you're using the consumer index as a scale (to measure benefits) then you are missing the tremendous additional cost of education."

Some quibbling over percentages then unsued between the two men, during which Mr. Vaughn said "More veterans now are taking advantage of educational benefits than after WW II". The crowd began to murmur and Senator Hartke said, "I think there are a couple fallacies in your statement. For one thing, a smaller percentage of WW II veterans were competing for higher educational benefits, since only about 50 per cent then graduated from high school, and that figure now would be close to 91 per cent."

After a bit more senatorial speechmaking, some of the vets got their chance to testify. Walter Nagle, representing the City University of New York Veterans' Action Coalition (CUNYVAC) read the "VietNam Veterans' Bill of Rights", which they had drawm up.

As the bill was being read, a vet standing nearby was asked if he realized that the jobs found for WW II vets were found through laying off most of the women who had filled them in wartime, and if that was what todays' vets are asking for? Frank Clark of CUNYVAC said, "No, definitely not. We feel there are enough available jobs if we can get training and education."

Walter Nagle, after reading the bill to the committee, explained that the existence of undesirable, dishonorable discharges and SPN numbers prevent vets from getting otherwise available jobs, and the fact that the VietNam was was unpopular and involved much drug abuse fosters hostile prejudice among employment recruiters.

"SPN numbers" appear on every discharge certificate, and exactly what they stand for is a military secret, but some veterans have discovered that the numbers can be a stigma.

SPN stands for Separation Program Number and, according to the VVAW publication "Winter Soldier", it can label the veteran "as a subversive, a sexual deviant, having an inadequate personality, or something equally incredible." Rep. John F. Seiberling of Ohio is quoted by Winter Soldier as saying "By having these numbers on the discharge certificate, the Defense department makes it possible for employers to decode them. It thereby participates in an invasion of privacy of thousands of veterans including many who have honorable discharges but unfavorable SPN's".

Afternoon activities were supposed to include "Project Apple", in which the UMass vets intended to stand on street corners in the vicinity of the White House distributing apples as a reminder of many vets' poverty, and a box lunch picnic by the CUNYVAC vets in Lafayette park.

Project Apple did not go off well. A group of veterans waited at Lafayette park for the apples to arrive. When the apples "didn't" and some confusion existed, many gave up and decided to get out of the cold and rain. Five vets still were there when the apples finally arrived. One of them, Jim Goodreau of UMass said, "The distribution really fell apart and while we were unloading the apples, some park police came over and said 'we don't want you people here, you'd best leave. And we didn't hassle with them, we peacefully left."

Project Apple finally did get underway on scattered street-corners throughout the city, leaving the White House in peaceful isolation.

SOVIET CIVIL RIGHTS

UMass group sends letter

Today, the COMMITTEE FOR HUMAN RIGHTS IN THE SOVIET AREA at the University of Massachusetts is mailing an Open Letter to all members of the U.S. Congress individually. The synopsis of the letter which was published earlier in full by the Daily Collegian, follows.

—Beyond plain human decency, Americans have a selfish interest in supporting the struggle of Soviet dissidents for democratization of the Soviet Union. This is why:

—Americans want a truly stable peace, not peace by five or ten-year installments; and disarmament without risks to their security.

—The Soviet rulers, on the contrary, need to make their subjects believe they are threatened by the United States.

—In this way, they justify the militaristic rigors of their regime as well as their own military maneuvers, and so maintain themselves in power.

—To accomplish this, they must keep the population in the dark about the true facts.

—Therefore, a high-priority goal of the West and the United States ought to be to penetrate the Soviet information barrier and communicate with the Soviet people directly.

—We have the technology and a certain amount of bargaining power to make practical moves in that direction.

—Only when the Soviet people know the facts will they have reason to restrain their rulers. As long as we are dealing with uncontrolled bureaucrats and generals, who are able to ignore the interests of their people, negotiations will be built on sand. Only democracy in the Soviet Union can provide a solid basis for bona fide negotiations and peace.

—Conclusion: Democratization in the Soviet area is of such vital importance to us that to support it ought to become our steady objective, even if this should take time to achieve.

Dolphin's days may be over

TORONTO (AP) — Larry Csonka, Jim Kiick and Paul Warfield of the Super Bowl champion Miami Dolphins grabbed at the chance for financial security Sunday by jumping from the National Football League to the World Football League's Toronto Northmen.

The move is effective at the start of the 1975 season — after the three play out the 1974 option on their NFL contracts — for a $3 million-plus, three-year package.

"I think the general consensus of opinion in the American public was that the World Football League wasn't a serious contender. We, however, felt differently and, after coming up here and listening to what they had to say, decided that the financial benefits are considerable," Csonka said.

And he pointed out that, even if the WFL never gets off the ground, they're guaranteed a healthy chunk of money.

The signing of Csonka, Kiick and Warfield gives the neophyte WFL instant respectability and a guaranteed gate attraction.

"Certainly, the financial security is very important to me and to my family," said Warfield, the Dolphins' star wide receiver. "It's almost like saying we're stealing a phrase from a movie of a couple of years ago — they made us an offer we couldn't refuse."

Kiick acknowledged that he jumped, in part, because of his dissatisfaction of recent years, when Mercury Morris pushed him out of a starting running back position. "I have a lot of pride and I want to play a lot of football," he said.

Csonka, saying he was speaking for Warfield and Kiick as well, said he was "looking forward to this upcoming season with as much anticipation as any of the years we've played for the Miami Dolphins. Nothing would be a greater tribute to the fact that we are leaving than the idea of leaving on a winning note..."

Csonka also pointed out that, in the 2½ months since Super Bowl VIII, there were no contract negotiations between the players and the Dolphins but that they had been in constant contact with Miami on Saturday and Sunday.

"We have a mutual representative in Ed Keating," Csonka said "and he was on the phone two or three or four times with Joe Robbie managing general partner of the Dolphins throughout the morning. As I understand it, there was a negative factor inasmuch as Mr. Robbie did not want to negotiate on the phone.

"So we had to consider the offer we had at hand and the idea that possibly it might not be the same if we stalled off...We had to more or less make our minds up on the spur of the moment."

Csonka, a 6-foot-2, 246-pound bulldozer and a six-year NFL veteran, rushed for more than 1,000 yards for the third straight season in 1973, then stampeded Minnesota into submission in Super Bowl VIII, pounding out a record 145 yards and two touchdowns in the Dolphins' 24-7 romp over the Vikings.

Warfield, a veteran of 10 NFL seasons, four of them with Miami, led the American Conference with 11 touchdown receptions in 1973. The 6-foot, 190-pounder, a speedy, sure-handed receiver, made 2 regualr-season catches for 514 yards, a 17.7-yard average.

Kiick, also a six-year veteran, teamed with Csonka to form the Dolphins' "Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid" tandem and, until Mercury Morris burst onto the scene in 1972, was Miami's No. 2 running back. His primary attribute is his versatility as a receiver and blocker as well as a runner. In 1973 he rushed 76 times for 257 yards and had 27 receptions for 208 yards.

MR. AND MRS. PIEL PENNINGTON look happy in Motor City as well they should because Pennington has just signed a contract with the Detroit Wheels of the World Football League. He was the number five choice of the Wheels in the draft of the fledgling league.

Royals defeat Sox

FT. MYERS, Fla. (AP) — Luis Tiant, listed as Boston's probable starting pitcher in an American League baseball opener Friday, took another pounding Sunday as the Red Sox dropped a 9-6 exhibition decision to the Kansas City Royals.

Tiant, a 20-game winner last season, gave up eight hits, including five for extra bases, and walked four in seven innings. He was charged with seven runs, including two unearned.

While preparing to start in the opener in Milwaukee later this week, the veteran right-hander has allowed 32 hits in 23 innings, walked eight and struck out eight. He has surrendered 19 earned runs for a fat 7.43 ERA.

Kansas City catcher Fran Healy of Holyoke, Mass., was the chief tormentor in handling the Red Sox their seventh loss in 23 Grapefruit League starts. He tripled and doubled against Tiant, driving in two runs, and then belted a long two-run homer off reliever Rogelio Moret in the eighth.

Despite the performances of the two pitchers, the Red Sox had a couple of pleasing efforts as Manager Darrell Johnson left most of his regulars at home in Winter Haven and played reserves.

Cecil Cooper continued his hot hitting with three singles. With eight hits in his last 11 times at bat, he has raised his spring average to .439-25 for 57. Cooper, a first baseman, was used as the designated hitter, with veteran Danney Cater playing first. Cater responded with three hits.

The Red Sox scored five runs against southpaw Paul Splittorf in the fourth. John Kennedy led off with a walk and Cooper, Cater and Bernie Carbo singled. After two more walks, a couple of infield outs brought in the fourth and fifth runs.

A single by Terry Hughes and a double by catcher Bob Didier provided another run in the sixth. It was Didier's first hit since he was acquired by the Red Sox last Tuesday.

The Red Sox make their final trip of the exhibition season Monday, travelling to St. Petersburg to play the St. Louis Cardinals. Southpaw Bill Lee, the most effective pitcher in the Boston camp and due to start in Milwaukee Saturday, will go against the Cards in a final Florida tuneup.

Bruins top Red Wings

BOSTON (AP) — Goals by Don Marcotte and Ken Hodge 15 seconds apart opened the Boston scoring gates in the third period and the Bruins poured in five goals for a 6 to 1 National Hockey League victory over the Detroit Red Wings Sunday.

The scoring included two goals by Hodge, his 48th and 49th of the season, and Phil Esposito's 67th. Esposito also had an assist to run his league-leading scoring total to 140 points.

Marcotte stickhandled around the Detroit defense for the score that broke a 1-1 tie while the Bruins were shorthanded at 1:55 of the third period. Hodge converted a pass from Wayne Cashman at 2:10.

Hodge got his 49th moments later taking a feed from Esposito at the blue line and driving a 40-footer past Detroit goalie Doug Grant.

Esposito broke the scoring ice at 1:40 of the second period and Pierre Jarry tied it for Detroit at 3:47.

Carol Vadnais wound up the scoring with a power play goal with two minutes left in the game.

Baseball squad comes North to open New England circuit

By MIKE BROPHY

MIAMI — For the UMass baseball fan the news is both good and bad. Perhaps it would be best to dispose of the bad news first by saying that the health of John Olson, co-captain and a big righty whom Coach Dick Bergquist was depending on to help alot this year, does not look bright at this moment.

For the good news, the Minutemen finished their best Southern trip ever with a five and three record overall and a three and two record in regulation season play. The first three games were exhibition games played against junior colleges in the Miami area.

UMass did manage to set a school record while down South, as Bergquist pointed out, by hitting five home runs in one game, one of them a grand slam by Rick Hansen, and still managing to lose the game by a 14-12 score to Florida International University. They were up by 9-2 at one point during the late stages of the game too.

The trip did what it was supposed to do, that being to get the New Englanders out of the Cage for some real baseball experience prior to opening their defense of the Yankee Conference. It also gave Bergquist the opportunity to settle his starting line-up, for the most part anyway. At this point the outfielders will shuffle in and out, depending on the DH needs of the team.

Second base is still up for grabs with Bill MacDonald, Joe Marzilli and Jerry Mondalto all in the running for the starting position. Mondalto's lack of aggressiveness at the plate has hurt his chances for the starting bid but Bergquist insists that he is still in the running.

The pitching, perhaps better known as the big question mark before going South, has done well under the pressure down South with the one exception of John Olson whom the doctors will examine today.

John Olson reinjured his right shoulder and will be examined by the UMass doctors today.

Sophomore John McManus won two ballgames for the squad and has a good fastball and slider, according to Bergquist. He had good to excellent control in his three outings in the 85 degree heat and sun.

Jeff Reardon, a freshman from Dalton, seems to have secured a starting position on the pitching rotation as he did well and proved he could possibly become the next strikeout artist at UMass. He averaged almost two K's per frame while working.

Ron Beaurivage held down the first base assignment as he was predicted to do and proved to be very aggressive with the bat at the plate, an asset to his favor with the offense-minded Bergquist hoping to score as many runs as possible this year.

The outfield shapes up with Peter Backstrom staying in center, Mike Joyce in left and Gary Sanderson in right with Rick Hansen capable of playing either right or left and filling in as the Designated Hitter.

Craig Allegrezza, too, hit well and was also tried at DH by Bergquist who was impressed.

Chip Baye and Steve Merrill did well for the pitching staff while in the sun and are in contention for a starting slot on the rotation as is freshman Jerry Erb. John Healy has won the catcher's box to himself for another year with Jim Black and Neal DesMarais backing him up.

Mike Koperniak has found himself a new home at shortstop and hit well at the plate collecting more than his share of rbi's on the trip with four.

The "hot corner", or third base, has been won by John Seed who is the perfect replacement for the graduated Mark Palau in both the field and at the plate.

The overall outlook is somewhat more optomistic at this point but it can be said that Bergquist would like to be more sure of both Allegrezza and Olson on his pitching staff.

Gorillas quelled 7-6 by Hofstra

By MIKE ELLIOTT

The UMass lacrosse team lost yesterday to Hofstra University by a score of 7 - 6 in the opening game of the season. The game was originally scheduled for Saturday, but was postponed til Sunday because of the heavy snowstorm which hit New York.

Hofstra jumped off to a 2-1 lead at the end of the first quarter. Garber's Gorillas (UMass) missed several scoring opportunities on fast breaks, including one shot which hit the Hofstra goalie in the head.

Said coach Dick Garber, "We could have been ahead at least 5-2 but we missed the fast breaks."

In the second period Hofstra continued to score and the Gorillas continued to miss and by the end of the first half, Hofstra had widened its lead to 4-2.

"In the first half," said Coach Garber, "we misfired on at least eight fast breaks."

Hofstra came out in the third quarter and broke the game open, 6-2. It seemed as if they could do nothing wrong. However, near the end of the third period things changed. The Gorillas suddenly turned it on. They capitalized on Hofstra's mistakes and scored four straight goals. They finally began to execute their plays and connect on their shots. With nine minutes left in the game they had tied the score at six goals.

Said Garber, "We began to put everything together in the third period and we started to gain momentum."

After UMass had tied the score, 6-6, they played very solidly. However, they were stifled by Hofstra and the rest of the game was very much evenly played until Hofstra capitalized on a UMass mistake.

With less than three minutes left to play in the game, the Gorillas were hit with a penalty. Hofstra took advantage of the extra man and promptly scored to take a 7-6 lead. The lead help up and the game ended, 7-6.

The Gorillas put it together in the last quarter but it was too late.

Coach Garber said, "The first half was the key because we missed some great scoring chances. We didn't play up to our calibre. Everything was off - passing, shooting, and stick-handling. We picked up momentum in the fourth period and Hofstra seemed to be just hanging on but we let them go."

The UMass scoring was supplied by attackmen Andy Scheffer (2 goals), and Harold McVey; and midfielders Hirsch Seidman, Steve Pappas, and Bill Arnold.

LACROSSE NOTES - The loss to Hofstra was disappointing because the Gorillas had played so well in spring scrimmages. During the past week they made a spring trip down to Long Island, New York. They beat: Nassau Community College 11-4, Princeton 15-6, and the Topay Lacrosse Club 16-6. "The team played excellent all week, especially against Princeton and Topay," said Coach Garber. ...The Gorillas will seek their first regular season win when they play at UConn on Thursday.

Veterans, Part II:

The women and human rights

By DENNY MATTEAU
MDC Staff

As the Senate hearing last Friday was adjourned, Senator Cranston (D-Calif), was asked if there was any special attention being paid to problems being faced by women veterans, in view of the fact that they are barred from membership in large veterans' organizations such as the VFW (Veterans of Foreign Wars). Sen. Cranston said that the Committee "is mindful of the women and giving their problems consideration." He then directed me to an aide, John Steinberg.

Steinberg said that the official availability of benefits to women was accomplished in 1972 by a law making it illegal for the Veterans' Administration to make any distinction between male and female vets, including in such factors as the $30 alotment to married vets on the educational payments. Previously, a male vet could receive this money automatically upon getting married while a woman had to demonstrate that her husband could not work.

Handing me some copies of veterans' legislation to look at, Steinberg said, "All reference to veterans as men has been struck out and the phrase 'his or her' used, to insure that officials realize that the law applies to both sexes."

"Mrs. Chisolm was on the committee, but left for some reason," he said in reference to Congresswoman Shirley Chisolm (D-Brooklyn), "and we have a problem contacting women to find out their needs because men's veterans groups don't represent them. In fact, could you speak to the women vets you know and have them give us a statement of some sort?" he asked, and then gave me his address, which is: John Steinberg, 4230 Dirksen Office Bldg. Washington, D.C., 20510.

Maria Larson and Pat Turney are two of the half dozen or so women veterans who went down to Washington with Project Apple. After arriving at American University, who gave the veterans quarters in a large room in their campus center, Pat Turney was queried on her experience as a veteran. She said, "I'm a feminist, and don't have time for the Vets' Club." Maria agreed with that, saying, "I have decided to have nothing to do with this Project Apple gig. Women veterans are not well organized as veterans because we've too many problems to deal with as women."

Pat and Maria did not have to explain their remarks to me. Before disembarking the bus at Amer. U., Al Metzner, a Vets' Club leader, hollered "...and men, I HEAR A. U. WOMEN ARE HUNGRY!" A general cheer went up as the men ran out of the bus.

As all of us stood about getting our baggage together, Metzner commented that there might be problems because A.U. Security had just revealed that no women would be allowed to sleep in the quarters given to the Vets' Club for the night. He seemed genuinely angry as he said to me, "Goddamn it, all America was told was that vets were coming, we didn't say they'd all be men and America did not have the right to make that assumption! But we'll get you all in, somehow."

Easter Seal goal 250,000 for crippled

Is it an art nouveau object or a funny looking freshman from Kansas??? Neither. The glass-like structure located outside the Campus Center Bookstore is one of eight plexi-glass cubes traveling around the state to help crippled children and adults. A project of the Youth for Easter Seals committee, this cube will hopefully be filled with 250,000 pennies (one ton). Student organizations throughout the State are holding special fund-raising events to raise pennies. When the cube arrives in their hometown area, they deposit the pennies.

This cube is scheduled to travel through Springfield, Greenfield, Pittsfield, Holyoke, and Northampton.

Any student or organization wishing to sponsor an event to help fill this cube is urged to contact Norma, 114 Crampton, tel. 546-9844.

Crime statistics released, Southwest top on list

By FRITS GEURTSEN
MDC Staff

Crime statistics, recently released by the UMass Department of Public Safety, indicate that the Southwest residential area has the highest incidence of crime on campus.

"This is to be expected to a certain extent," said David Johnston, director of the epartment, "because Southwest does house almost 50 per cent of the students living on campus. However, they've got 62 per cent of the crime. It's the only area on campus whose percentage of crime exceeds its percentage of the total population."

The area second in crime incidence, according to the statistics, was Central, with 18 per cent of the campus population and 16 per cent of the crime. Orchard Hill and Sylvan were third and fourth respectively. Northeast had the lowest incidence with only 4 per cent.

The crime statistics, which cover the period from January 1973 to February 1974, are based on the number of reported incidents, and so give only a partial picture of the actual crime situation on campus.

As one resident of Cashin Dorm put it, when told that eight larcenies had occurred there last year, "That sounds more like the total after one weekend than a whole year. A lot of things just never get reported."

Larceny was by far the most frequently occurring crime last year. The articles that thieves preferred were cash, bicycles, stereos, and televisions in that order.

"One interesting fact in regard to the larcenies," said Johnston, "is the time that they occurred. Most larcenies were committed during the time that students were eating their meals. Noon and five-thrity were peak periods for larceny."

Melville, Mackimmie, and John Adams, all dorms in Southwest, reported the greatest incidence of larcenies. Crabtree, Leach, and Mary Lyon, all women's dorms in Northeast, had no report of any larcenies at all.

Vandalism was the second most frequently-occurring crime. Fire alarms and fires was third and obscene and annoying phone calls was fourth. Again Southwest had a disproportionately high share of the crimes.

"I want to emphasize," concluded Johnstone, "that even with the amount of unreported crime added to the statistics, the incidence of crime on this campus is very low, and with this many people in one place that's pretty remarkable, I think."

Rent increase voted for Lincoln and University apartments

By BONNIE ASSELIN

The Married Student Housing committee yesterday afternoon unanimously voted for a rent increase to tenants living in University and Lincoln apartments. It amounts to a more than 25 per cent increase or between 40 and 50 dollars.

During the hour and a half meeting, the committee, made up of administrators and student housing representatives, agreed to move to combine all married student housing under one system. University and Lincoln apartments were operating under one budget and were in the black, but North Village was losing money. The committee voted to pool the apartment costs under one system in order to meet expenses at North Village. Their recommendation will be put before the Board of Trustees for final passage.

Brian Luce, a representative from University apartments, said, "I don't think it's a very good idea." North Village has been a "real thorn in the side of the Administration," said Luce, adding: "From their point of view, it's the only way to make two ends meet." Luce also expressed concern on how suddenly the new budget was proposed, last week, and to be finalized, by April 5.

Don Pelky, director of student housing, felt it was the "more prudent" alternative to the budget problems. "To put all University housing under one system, is more equitable for the future. North Village tenants need a break as well as Lincoln's," he said.

Pelky hopes the new rent increase will provide revenue for capital improvements, repairing the exterior of the buildings and replacing appliances.

Both Pelky and Luce are members of the student housing committee.

Sunday, April 7, in the Campus Center, there will be an open meeting to all tenants to discuss the budget and to explain how the committee came to the decision. It will begin at 7 p.m.

"Mass. Caucus '74" held

By REID FISHMAN
MDC Staff

Over 3300 liberal Democrats from across the state gathered in Framingham for what was commonly billed as "Mass. Caucus '74". The purpose of the caucus was to endorse Democratic candidates for Secretary of State and Attorney General within the state of Massachusetts.

The caucus began at 9 a.m. and proceeded until around 6 p.m., with State Senator John Olver chairing the entire event. There were four candidates competing for the endorsement for Secretary of State, along with eight candidates vying for Attorney General. In the race for Secretary of State, the vote was continually close as Boston City Councillor Larry DiCara carried the first ballot with 43.95 per cent of the votes cast, falling short of the 60 per cent required to win an endorsement. However, on the second ballot, State Rep. Paul Guzzi was able to capture votes lost by State Rep. John Bussinger, and take the lead in the voting with 47.9 per cent.

As the third ballot was about the begin, Bussinger stood up on stage and dropped out of the race, saying, "I think the purpose of the caucus would be better served if it were a two candidate race." Then, in an unexpected move, DiCara stood up and said, "I come before you to withdraw." He further went on to say, "I am more interested in the victory of a reformist candidate than in my own candidacy."

After a hardy standing ovation, Paul Guzzi then stood up to accept the endorsement, saying, "John Davoren, here I come." Guzzi will now go on to challenge incumbent Democrat John Davoren in the primary in September.

The race for Attorney General was not so close, with Attorney Edward F. Harrington in control throughout the caucus. Harrington won a third ballot endorsement, but will still have to go on to face the other seven candidates in the Democratic primary.

BOYCOTT SCAB PRODUCTS

Since the picket lines of scab fields in California were called off last spring, the Farmworkers Union has had to resort to support from consumers in the form of a boycott of all scab products and stores selling them. Students in the five-college area, having set up the Juan de la Cruz boycott committee, have organized and participated in picket lines at all the major chain stores and smaller independent stores.

At this time, all the major chain stores in Western Massachusetts have given committmients not to stock scab produce any longer. It was through the pressure of the picket lines that these committments were won. Nevertheless, the A&P chain, the largest chain in the country and the third largest in New England, still refuses to recognize the United Farmworkers Union and continues to stock scab produce.

Right now, the members and supporters of the Boycott Committee are involved in weekly pickets (Friday nights 6-9 and Saturday 11-4) at the Northampton A&P store on King Street. Picketers, having been met with near confrontations with police, store management and violently irate customers, have been on picket lines at the store since early March have stood for hours on the lines, often singing and chanting, talking to customers in attempts to convince them of the importance of an effective boycott.

Students interested in learning more about the farmworkers and their struggle are urged to come to the day of films (Commonwealth room of the S.U.) on Wed. and to hear the Vice-President of the Union, Dolores Huerta on Friday (2:30 in the SU Ballroom). Anyone interested in picketing should call either Steve at 546-6614 or Wendy at 549-6702.

Vietnam vets day in Washington

"They are not 'vets' women, they are vets!"

was responsible for this rule and what the Vets' Club intended to do about it, in the interest of my own security as well as the interest of journalism, all I was told was not to worry. I spoke to about six male veterans and could not seem to get it across to a single one that I was not asking whether men and women would be sleeping together. One unidentified Vets' Club member walked over to me as I was speaking to another and said, "Look, everything here is cool and no one cares if you do it or who you do it with, just don't do it in front of a security guard."

At the organizational meeting that evening, the issue of amnesty for war resisters was the major point of discussion, since there was some disagreement as to the manner in which it should be integrated into the bread-and-butter objectives of Project Apple. Only one person out of the 80 or so at the meeting voiced opposition to the actual idea of amnesty.

One vet summed up the position of most of the opposition to acting on amnesty when he said, "Look, we can say this is where we stand on Project Apple, and we'll be back soon on Amnesty and Dishonorable Discharges!"

Bill Stewart of South Deerfield represented a body of veterans who felt amnesty should not be forgotten, and read a statement they had drawn up, which said, in part, "...There are hundreds of thousands of brothers and sisters in exile, all with concerned families, who refused to participate for induction into the military. They too, (as well as those who went a.w.o.l. in resistance) have different moral and political reasons for their actions. They, too, cannot return on their own energy...

"...The issue of amnesty cannot be ignored...the Vietnam veterans from the University of Massachusetts area reject the contention that Viet Nam Era Veterans are against amnesty.

"It is our conviction after dealing with thousands of Viet Nam Era Veterans in the Massachusetts area that the support of amnesty is widespread."

A vote of Vets' Club members on whether the club would lend official support to the statement or not was taken, and the motion carried, 26 to 6. Only Vets' Club members were supposed to vote, and many of the veterans present did not consider themselves members.

Thinking that the vote signaled the end of the amnesty discussion, and having found that none of the women vets had been informed of the security problem — although they had noticed the sign on the ladies' room door changing it to a mens' room during the Veterans activities — I introduced the question, asking if the Vets' Club intended to support the women vets' right to be there. Joe Hansen, president of the club, got up and started talking about amnesty and about general aspects of whether or not one should work within the system, and the meeting broke up soon after.

In an interview later that evening, I asked him why the meeting did not deal with the discrimination being practiced against women vets. He said, "There were security guards at that meeting, and the executive committee decided that it would be best to just ignore the rule. We were afraid that if we made an issue of it, there'd be about eight guards to deal with when we got back tonight, instead of just two."

Maria Larson, in an interview the next day, said, "None of those vets in that organization, those self-styled 'leaders' who you saw do all the talking, none of them ever said a word to us about it (the security problem) and that's why women split from the leftist movement in the first place, men only speak to us when they want us to cook. If you try to work with them, you'll get co-opted."

"In order to be respected," Maria said, "a woman has to conspicuously assert that she has experience and knowledge, while a man is given the benefit of the doubt.

"My theory on why Vets' benefits went down is that during the Vietnam Era, GI's finally got it together on individual rights, and I think in the eyes of the government, to give those GI's equal benefits to WW II GI's would be to condone their fight for rights. I really feel there's a retaliation going on. I can see no other reason for the benefits to have been reduced."

Getting back to the interview with Joe Hansen, I must admit that my attitude in questioning him veered from one of journalistic objectivity, for when Hansen referred to the women as "the vets' women" I quickly interrupted him and said "They are not 'vets' women', they are vets!" The interview turned into an argument. Hansen seems to have wanted more female participation in the club, but faced with the attitude of women who now reject male-initiated organization, he couldn't get it.

"But we tried!", he said, "Why, at the first meeting, I saw a woman there, Erica Leer, and I immediately approached her and asked her to be on our executive committee, because I didn't want fingers pointed at us with cries of tokenism! We gave her real work to do, too, she's our Press agent!"

I spoke to Erica Leer, but she had little to say. I asked her what it was like to work with the Vets Club, and she said, "It's ok." and smiled.

Maria Larson had more to say as we waited for our bus home. She was describing the manner in which women in the military are required to dress for men, wearing make-up, nylons and high heels are mandatory in many situations, and the young man listening was shocked. He said he had not realized the women had no choice in the military, he just thought they all wanted to look sexy.

Grass expert honored

Joseph Troll, in 17 years at UMass has helped make grass green from Cape Cod to Canada.

As director of the UMass turfgrass program, he has added a six-acre turfgrass research plot, developed a laboratory, added staff and tackles several research projects a year. He also assists in the UMass Extension turfgrass program, solving problems for big turf operations and for home-owners.

Of equal importance is his teaching. Some 1300 alumni of his various turfgrass programs have gone out to make things green in various ways—at golf courses, in park work, the landscape business, and so on.

Joseph Troll

Dr. Troll directs the annual UMass Turfgrass Conference, which for the past several years has been attended by 730 to 800 people. This year's conference, held early in March, honored him in three ways.

The turfgrass alumni of UMass presented a plaque with the following inscription, "In appreciation to Dr. Joseph Troll for his sincerity, energy, and dedication to the field of turfgrass in teaching, extension and research over a period of 17 years and for upholding the high standards and traditions of the University of Massachusetts turfgrass program: Presented in grateful appreciation by the University of Massachusetts Turfgrass Alumni."

The Golf Course Superintendents Association of New England presented a golf bag, set of golf clubs and a plaque for "outstanding and dedicated service," and the Cape Cod Golf Course Superintendents Association presented him with a check for his many years of outstanding service to the turfgrass industry.

Concert proceeds stolen

By BOB MAC KAY

Proceeds were stolen from the NRBQ-Clean Living Concert that was held last night in the Student Union Ballroom. The concert was sponsored by the Poverty Committee (RSO 490).

Because the theft was still under investigation at press time, very few details were available. Therefore, the exact amount stolen had not been determined, but the figure could be around $400. The robbery occured at approximately 12:15 p.m.

The theft was not a forced one — no guns or other weapons were used. Further information will be forthcoming in tomorrow's Collegian.

Stans-Mitchell trial in 7th week

SEC investigator under political pressure

NEW YORK (AP) — A Securities and Exchange Commission investigator, who developed a multimillion dollar fraud case against financier Robert L. Vesco, testified yesterday he was under pressure to avoid anything that might prove "politically embarrassing."

Stanley Sporkin, stocky, dark-haired veteran of 13 years with the SEC, was a government witness at the outset of the seventh week in the criminal conspiracy trial of former Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell and one-time Commerce Secretary Maurice H. Stans.

Sporkin basically covered the same ground as that covered last week by his onetime superior, former SEC Chairman G. Bradford Cook.

But Cook's testimony was tainted by his admission to the jury that he had perjured himself at least five times before his appearance at the Mitchell-Stans trial.

Mitchell and Stans are accused of impeding the SEC inquiry in return for Vesco's secret $200,000 cash contribution to President Nixon's 1972 re-election campaign.

The two defendants had quit the Cabinet to run the campaign.

The indictment charges as part of the conspiracy, Stans caused Cook to eliminate a reference in the Vesco fraud complaint that might reveal the $200,000 contribution and also sought to have withheld transcripts of testimony in the case, which might have the same effect.

The conspiracy phase of the indictment also charged that Mitchell sought through Cook's predecessor as SEC Chairman, William Casey, to have testimony from two Vesco stenographers postponed by the agency.

Sporkin said he told Casey that the women had to do with the $200,000.

"Mr. Casey said to me, 'why couldn't we postpone these women.' He mentioned to me this was the week before election. He said to me he believed they could be politically embarrassing if their testimony came out. He said, 'Stan, you know how things leak out of the commission, and these could leak out."

"I said the testimony could not be postponed. I said that would be wrong..."

"I said, 'Bill, you must rely on my judgment in this matter. Someday you're going to be thankful for relying on my judgment."

The two women were called as planned, but both took the Fifth Amendment and Vesco's contribution remained secret for the time being.

As for a disputed paragraph in the fraud complaint that was filed Nov. 27, 1972, Sporkin said Cook suggested the section be removed. Instead Sporkin and Cook agreed to make it less specific. It was redrafted to eliminate any specific reference to the movement of the Vesco money.

Regarding the transcripts, Sporkin said he raised no objection to their being withheld from the court records of the Vesco case, after a colleague assured him they were not needed in the civil prosecution of the matter.

In early February 1973, Sporkin told of another meeting with Cook. He testified:

"Mr. Cook asked me when we were going to make this thing public. I said we were, as soon as we had all the information from our sources. He then asked that we postpone making our end public, until the Committee to Re-elect the President made their end public. I said,,,No, absolutely.'"

Jury chosen as Chapin trial begins

By HARRY F. ROSENTHAL
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) — A jury of seven men and five women was chosen Monday to try Dwight L. Chapin, President Nixon's former appointments secretary, on four charges that he lied under oath to a grand jury. Four alternates also were chosen.

Four of the women and one of the men on the jury are white. The rest are black.

The jurors were sequestered Monday night and will be for the rest of the trial.

Chapin's lawyers argued in pretrial motions that a predominantly black jury might be prejudiced against their client. The judge rejected their motion to move the case elsewhere.

The jury was selected in less than four hours, and the judge said the taking of testimony will begin Tuesday morning.

He disclosed that Chapin's attorney several days ago filed a motion objecting to certain "dirty tricks documents being presented at the trial. He said he would not rule on the point immediately.

U.S. District judge Gerhard A. Gesell said he expected the trial to be completed by the end of next week.

Chapin is accused of making false statements about the political activities of Donald H. Segretti in the 1972 Florida primary. The four counts against Chapin carry maximum penalties of five years in prison and $10,000 each.

He is the first staff member of Nixon's inner circle at the White House to go on trial. Two former Cabinet members, John N. Mitchell and Maurice Stans, are currently being tried by a federal jury in New York in a campaign contributions case.

Special prosecutor says:

Boyle financed murders

MEDIA, Pa. (AP) — The special prosecutor in the murder trial of former United Mine Workers Union President W.A. "Tony" Boyle said yesterday the assassination of Boyle's union rival was financed by "the sweat and blood of miners."

Special Prosecutor Richard Sprague said Boyle "plotted and paid for the murders" of Joseph A. "Jock" Yablonski, his wife and 25-year-old daughter.

Chief defense lawyer Charles T. Moses said, "The ultimate issue is simply whether Mr. Boyle was responsible for these deaths. The answer is no."

Both sides presented opening statements to a jury of nine men and three women in a nearly full courtroom. Delaware County Common Pleas Court Judge Francis Catania presided over the case.

The Yablonskis were shot to death at their Clarksville, Pa., home on Dec. 31, 1969, three weeks after Boyle defeated Yablonski in an election for the UMW presidency.

Sprague used a huge map showing six coal-mining states and Washington, D.C., to trace events beginning in June, 1969, when he said Boyle ordered Yablonski killed.

The prosecutor said Boyle's order came less than a month after Yablonski announced his candidacy on may 29, 1969. "He signed his own death warrant by challenging Boyle's UMW leadership," he said.

Sprague said the orders to kill Yablonski went from echelon to echelon to hide the scheme. He said Boyle appropriated $20,000 in union funds to finance the killing, but at each union level a little was raked off.

He said the money went through a complex procedure of bogus payments and kickbacks involving 23 individual union members and ended up in District 19, which covers Kentucky and Tennessee.

Expo lacks ecology unit

SPOKANE, Wash. (AP) — Expo '74, billed as the World's Environmental Fair, lacks a single exhibit by a national conservation group.

Some ecologists say the cost would be prohibitive. Others cite environmental reasons or complain about its commercialism.

Expo opens on May 4 with 11 nations, three states, two Canadian provinces, eight industries and the United States Bureau of Reclamation among the 43 exhibitors.

"There's a good reason why the Sierra Club isn't exhibiting at Expo," said Dr. Thatcher Hubbard of the Spokane chapter. "Most of the environmental groups are opposed to expo. We call it ecophoney.

"This is a trade fair put on by a bunch of merchants to increase profits.

Belfast violence hits army post

BELFAST, Northern Ireland (AP) - Guerrillas attacked a British army post yesterday and wounded two soldiers after a weekend of violence that left six persons dead and three towns scarred by bombs.

Britain's administrator for the Wartorn Province told the House of Commons in London the Irish Republican Army may be launching "a spring offensive to bomb themselves to the conference table."

But he hinted that the British government will not consider negotiating with the IRA, which wants to oust British rule from the province.

"We will talk to those who act politically because that is what this house is in business for," Northern Ireland Secretary Merlyn Rees said. He added that terrorist organizations will "not deflect the government from political decisions."

In the attack on the army post in Londonderry, "small arms fire, mortar bombs and possibly rockets were used," an army officer said. "It was all over quite quickly."

In Belfast, troops and police joined forces in the biggest security operation in nearly two years, sealing off an entire Roman Catholic section and checking every house.

An army spokesman said the search resulted in "a considerable haul" of weapons and explosives. The security forces also received "a huge amount of information" from the area's residents, he said.

The district searched, known as the market area, is a tightly packed maze of small terrace houses near the center of Belfast. It is a center of IRA activity and has seen its share of the sectarian bloodshed which has cost Northern Ireland nearly 1,000 dead in the last five years.

Belfast's main shopping thoroughfare, Royal Avenue, was still closed to traffic after being devastated by a 600-pound bomb Thursday.

AP News Roundup

Lifting of controls

WASHINGTON (AP) - With less than a month to go until its control program expires, the Cost of Living Council yesterday lifted wage and price controls from about 165 industries and 10 per cent of the labor force.

It was the council's biggest single decontrol action to date, and seemed certain to result in higher prices for items ranging from wearing apparel to movie tickets to life insurance premiums.

No moon on Mercury

PASADENA, Calif. (AP) - A mysterious object which scientists thought might be a small moon near Mercury has been found to be radiation from a distant star, Mariner 10 officials said yesterday.

Dr. A. Lyle Broadfoot of the Kitt Peak National Observatory near Tucson, Ariz., said his team of scientists had mistakenly thought the object was moving.

Ethiopian protests

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia (AP) - Four thousand university students went on strike yesterday and club-swinging police scattered teen-aged demonstrators in Addis Ababa as protests against the new government of Prime Minister Endalkachew Mokonnen erupted across Ethiopia.

Student violence was reported in two provincial capitals.

Court orders bank records

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court yesterday upheld a controversial federal law requiring banks to keep extensive records and report to the government on large cash transactions by their customers.

The 6 to 3 decision sustained the government's contention that the law's provisions were a constitutionally permissible means to counter increasingly sophisticated crime.

In upholding the Bank Secrecy Act, the court said neither the law nor accompanying regulations of the Treasury Department violate the Fourth Amendment protection of the right against self incrimination.

Under the department's regulations, banks must report the names of those involved and a summary of domestic cash transactions involving more than $10,000 and international currency movements exceeding $5,000.

A three-judge federal court had upheld the portions of the law requiring extensive record keeping by banks and the reporting of foreign transactions, but had said the domestic reporting regulations unreasonably invaded the right to privacy.

Two UN observers kidnapped as fighting rages in Golan

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Fighting raged on the Golan Heights front for the 21st straight day yesterday and the Israeli radio said Syrian army units had kidnaped two United Nations observers, apparently mistaking them for Israeli soldiers.

It said two were abducted from their outposts between Israeli and Syrian forces late Friday and were in a Damascus hospital last night.

The radio said the observers were led back to Syrian lines barefoot before the mistake was discovered.

The observers are stationed between Syrian and Israeli forces on the 40-mile front to report violations of the truce. The observers include American and Soviet contingents.

The Israeli military command confirmed the radio report but did not elaborate.

At the United Nations in New York, a U.N. spokesman said the two were picked up by a Syrian patrol on the Israeli side of the truce line Sunday night and were taken to the Italian hospital in Damascus. He said they were not injured.

The spokesman identified the two as Capt. J. A. Mortell of Ireland and Capt. J. J. Holly of the United States.

Earlier, the command said it had bolstered its front line forces on the Heights and stepped its alert to check Syrian troop movements.

President's council accepts offshore drilling with care

WASHINGTON (AP) — The President's Council of Environmental Quality reportedly has concluded that the opening of the Atlantic Coast and the Gulf of Alaska for oil exploration and production poses environmental risks, but that the risks are acceptable if approached with care.

The Washington Post said Monday that this was the chief conclusion reached by the council in a year-long study prepared for the President.

However, John A. Busterud, a member of the council; said the council's conclusions and recommendations have not yet undergone final council review and were not scheduled for publication and formal transmission to the President until April 18.

The council's factual findings, pointing to serious environmental, social and economic problems if the new offshore areas are opened for petroleum development, were made public 10 days ago — without the key chapter containing the council's conclusions and recommendations.

The Washington Post said a draft of that chapter concludes that petroleum leasing "can by undertaken in these waters under carefully stipulated and controlled condition."

The necessary conditions would include placing high priority on environmental protection, using the best available technology to minimize environmental risk, and enforcing the rules strictly, the draft report was quoted as saying.

The council reportedly urged giving the public "a major advisory role" and said the planning of offshore development must be meshed with state and local action in the affected areas.

While a cautiously favorable council report would provide encouragement for the Nixon administration to proceed with further steps toward leasing the new offshore areas, final decisions would still lie far in the future.

Busterud said that the council's year-long study would not be a legal substitute for the "environmental impact statements" required by law for any major federal action affecting the environment, such as offshore leasing.

Busterud said environmental impact statements would have to be prepared by appropriate federal agencies — probably the Interior Department — before any decision for or against offshore leasing could be made.

Such statements, based on past experience, probably would require massive, time-consuming studies and would carry the risk of possible challenges in court — a fate which delayed the controversial Alaska oil pipeline and offshore leasing in the Gulf of Mexico.

Leasing of areas off the Atlantic Coast must, in any case, the resolution of the current legal battle between the federal government and the coastal states for jurisdiction over offshore areas.

Prices rise and fluctuate but gasoline is available

By JEFFREY D. ALDERMAN
Associated Press Writer

Most Americans are paying between 50 and 60 cents a gallon for gasoline these days, but the prices they pay vary widely even within a single community.

A 50-state Associated Press survey found the lowest price was 41.9 cents a gallon for regular gasoline at a cut-rate station in Kansas City. The highest was 67.4 for premium in Juneau, Alaska, where most people are paying over 60 cents for regular.

Regional differences in gasoline price are not surprising. State gasoline taxes vary widely, as do the costs of shipping gasoline from one place to another.

But wide differences within a single community have begun to puzzle motorists already suspicious about the causes of this winter's gasoline shortage.

Example: in Atlanta, Ga., you can go to Texaco station and pay 54.9 cents a gallon for regular, but at an Exxon station it's only 45.4.

In Louisville, Ky., Standard is selling regular at 52.9, but Marathon is at 57.3 and Gulf at 55.2.

The major oil companies each have different wholesale prices for their gasoline. The price is determined, in part, by the costs involved in producing the fuel. The biggest cost factor is the cost of the crude oil from which the gasoline is refined. If the company has a great deal of expensive foreign crude, its gasoline will cost more.

Each company lists a posted price for each of the hundreds of markets it has across the country. This price includes crude costs and transportation costs.

When the gasoline from a given company arrives at the stations it serves within a given market, the price is the same to each station, oil company spokesman and Federal Energy Office officials say.

Price difference between different brands within one community therefore come from the different wholesale prices, which can fluctuate from month to month. But other factors are involved, too.

AEC charged with solar energy delay

WASHINGTON (AP) — Sen. James Abourezk, D-S.D., has charged that the Atomic Energy Commission is withholding evidence that solar energy can be developed far more quickly and cheaply than had been thought.

In a statement issued by his office, Abourezk called on the General Accounting Office to investigate the matter.

The evidence that solar energy development is feasible is contained in a report prepared by AEC scientists, said Abourezk, who charged that "this evidence was ignored and even openly misrepresented..."

Abourezk asserted that "some major oil companies are busily taking out patents on key solar energy components and buying up solar energy companies, while the public is led to believe that threre are no forseeable alternatives to environmentally destructive energy sources such as nuclear energy, coal and oil shale."

Russian oil sent to U.S. during boycott

NEW YORK (AP) - The Russians were shipping quanitities of their own petroleum products to the United States at the same time they were publicly encouraging the Arab oil boycott against this country.

U.S. Customs records here show that since the first of the year, four tankers have docked in New York and New Jersey ports carrying Soviet petroleum supplies, including millions of gallons of gasoline.

In Washington, federal officials said they were not surprised to learn of the Russian imports. One State Department official said the imports began long before the Arab boycott and there never was any indication the Soviet Union intended to join the Arab action.

"In fact," the State Department official said, "I don't think the Arabs ever asked the other OPEC Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries members to join the boycott."

In the case of some of the imports, he added, "the same ships that took over our wheat brought back their oil."

A Federal Energy Office official in Washington said he too would have been surprised if the Russians had joined the embargo.

Free milk in Maine

AUGUSTA, Maine (AP) - A Maine dairyman says he will give away 100 quarts of milk here today, even though the state has challenged what he calls his constitutional right to do so.

Leroy Gower, 38, of South China, said: "I have a constitutional right to give milk away if I own it. The Maine Milk Commission must stop me or loose its control."

The commission is a state agency empowerd to set the minimum price of milk in all controlled areas of Maine. The current minimum price for about 90 per cent of the population is $1.62 a gallon.

MMC Executive Secretary Walter B. Steele Jr. said if Gower goes through with his milk give-away, "proper action will be taken under advise from legal counsel."

Boston referendum

BOSTON (AP) - Supreme Judicial Court Justice Edward Hennessey ruled yesterday that the Boston school referendum will not be held today. The ruling was in the form of an injunction.

Hennessey said legislation providing for the referendum inadvertently changed the financial autonomy of the city's school committee in the reform proposal.

Judge Hennessey said this was not the intention of mayor Kevin H. White or of the city council.

If the election were held today, the judge said, the election would be illegal "because the reform proposals do not conform to the intentions of the mayor or the city council."

Construction down

BOSTON (AP) - Non-residential building starts in Massachusetts in January were down 72.5 per cent from the same month a year ago, according to figures released yesterday by the governor's Board of Economic Advisors.

Residential building starts during January were down 20.9 per cent from January of 1973, the board said.

The figures were included in a new report to be issued by the board each month.

Board Chairman Albert J. Kelley said at a briefing that the figures reflect a general slowdown in the state and national economy.

Kelley and board member William H. Gassett were optimistic about the Massachusetts economy, however. They said the state's technology capability might mean that Massachusetts will be doing better than most other states economically once the slowdown ends.

Nixon as liability

BRIDGEPORT, Conn. (AP) - Republican Congressman Stewart B. McKinney said yesterday that if he runs for re-election, he would turn down aay offer by President Nixon to campaign for him in Fairfield County this year.

Nixon would be a "liability" until he explains his role in the Watergate scandal, McKinney said.

McKinney said he hadn't decided whether to seek a third term and would announce his decision by May 1. Aides said McKinney was "leaning toward running" for a third term.

McKinney said his family would be the biggest factor in his decision. He said it was obvious that "families of politicians aren't enjoying life these days" in light of decisions by Gov. Thomas J. Meskill and former state environment chief Dan Lufkin not to run this year.

He criticized Congress and the state legislature for delaying election reform. He said he planned to accept no contributions greater than $100 this year and no money from "organized groups."

Public impeachment

NEWTON (AP) - House Majority Leader Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., D-Mass., says that regardless of the position taken by the House Judiciary Committee, both the majority and minority reports on the impeachment proceedings agains President Nixon must be made public.

O'Neill, speaking before a crowd of about 700 persons Sunday night, reiterated his prediction that if the commitee issues a favorable report on impeachment, no more than 80 members of Congress will vote against it.

He said the 14 member committee should vote on impeachment by June 14.

Holyoke strike

HOLYOKE (AP) - Round-the-clock picketing began yesterday as 380 employes walked off their jobs at the Brown Co. here in a contract dispute.

The strike shut down operations at the paper manufacturer's Eagle A Division.

Members of the Eagle Lodge No. 1 and the United Papermakers and Paperworkers Union Local 226 struck after rejecting a compromise contract offer last week.

The dispute centered around pay raises and the duration of the contract, union officials said.

A union spokesman said both sides were hoping for an early settlement of the walkout.

State House demonstrators change death penalty vote

BOSTON (AP) — Groups for and against the death penalty demonstrated in front of the State House as the Senate prepared to take up the veto of the death penalty yesterday.

One senator, Stephen J. McGrail, D-Wakefield, said he would change his vote of last week to uphold the veto after he toured his district and found 70 per cent of his consitutents against his stand.

He said he still doubted the constitutionality of the legislation.

McGrail said "The time has come for elected officials to go listen to the citizens." He said he would vote against his conscience on other issues, "if there's a clear mandate."

He said he did not know if his earlier stand had put him in political trouble, "but that played no part in my decision."

"Any senator could get elected or defeated on this issue," he said.

About 100 policemen, most from Boston but including others from eastern Massachusetts communities, carried signs favoring capital punishment in a big circle in front of the State House steps.

One sign read "Let's have the comfort chair back."

One organizer, Boston patrolman William Hill, said legislators were "sitting under that golden dome thumbing their noses at the people."

"We're going to use every bit of influence we can to knock some of these people out on election day," Hill said.

When the policemen left, a slightly larger group of mostly young people marched carrying signs for abolition of the death penalty.

Several policemen visited senators from their communities who voted to uphold the veto, asking them to change their votes. Some sat in the galleries as the Senate convened.

The House voted 151-78 last week to override the veto of the bill requiring the death penalty for nine kinds of murder. The Senate voted 24-15 to override, two votes shy of the necessary two-thirds majority. The question before the Senate Monday was reconsideration of that vote.

Russell Daniels: a victim of "intended deceits"

By ROBERT SHEMELIGIAN

Russell Daniels, a retarded citizen, has been in Norfolk State Prison for over a year having been convicted on his own signed confession — which he couldn't read.

Three detectives persuaded Russell, a 28 year old man with the mind of a nine-year-old and the reading comprehension of a second grader, to sign the confession he did not understand after grilling him for seven hours and then telling him "they would let him go if he talked, but would lock him up if he didn't talk."

Russell, a black, was convicted of second degree murder on this evidence by an all white, mostly elderly jury.

These and other circumstances surrounding his conviction and imprisonment are so vague and scandalous that it makes me wonder: is there any protection for our retarded citizens?

I have read accounts reporting Russell to be extremely friendly and cooperating, a fact that aroused the suspicion of the Springfield police (along with his color) and caused them to pick him up. Looking back on my experiences at Belchertown State School, I find it easy to believe.

In the short two weeks I was at Belchertown I was overwhelmed with the friendliness of the inmates and their desire for attention. This might be attributed to all around poor conditions of the place. The inmates spend most of their lives in understaffed buildings lacking in facilities.

The inmates were constantly trying to hug or touch people and never once did I see them hurt anyone. A staff psychologist told me that there was proportionately less physical violence among the inmates than in society.

So, Russell Daniels was rewarded for his cooperation with the system with a life term in prison. Many people say he is innocent, but what if he isn't? Is it just to give a nine-year-old life imprisonment for any reason?

One fact remains: guilty or innocent, he was given an unfair trial. So, in the past year he has been in jail, what has been done for him?

Benjamin Ricci, president of the Belchertown State School Friends Association has written to everyone from Mass. State Representatives to the governor. The result has been a lot of red tape, buck passing, and lies. The most extreme example of this was a letter written to Dr. Ricci from Rudy Magnone, the Regional Administrator for Mental Retardation assuring him of the steps he had taken "to assure that Russell is given all the rights he is entitled to."

A lawyer, J. Arthur Hickerson, investigated some of the things Mr. Magnone said in his letter and found it "to be a complete line of intended deceit on the part of the author", he also said "so what I think you are trying to give to Dr. Ricci is a line of B.S.

A group of UMass Students working hard to reopen the Daniels case have planned "Russell Daniels Night" April 3 at Mahar.

Daniel's case is not the only one of its kind. John Boone has estimated that between 5 and 10 percent of Massachusetts prison population should be treated as mentally retarded.

Hopefully the Daniels case will raise people's awareness enough so that retarded citizens in the future will receive more protection.

Letters to the editor

Help needed...boycott lettuce, wine

To The Editor:

Four years ago the United Farmworkers (AFL-CIO) negotiated their first contracts with the management of California agricultural corporations. Those contracts were a major breakthrough for the workers trying to overcome the oppression of the growers who employ them. Nevertheless, the struggle continues, workers still live in substandard housing, are poisoned by improper use of pesticides, and die at a rate three times that of the national average. Workers' children are still forced to work in the fields because of the low wages paid to the laborers. Labor contractors continue to exploit those they do the "service" of hiring by deducting up to 22 per cent of the worker's pay for that service and by providing housing, transportation, food and tools at inflated prices for workers who are not allowed into town to shop for themselves, often because they are of Mexican and not Anglo heritage.

The United Farmworkers' Union, the unanimous choice of the workers, is organizing workers in an effort to overcome the racist discrimination that has resulted in their lower social status. The Union, the workers' only chance, has tried to fight for the workers' demands by going on strike and setting up picket lines at the fields. Nevertheless, although the strikes have been up to 90 per cent effective for short periods of time, they have had to be called off because of the danger to the strikers. Two men have already been killed, many others injured in pickets of scab fields. The strike has been moved from the hands of the workers to those of the consumers and now it is up to us, as the citizens who make up the market for lettuce, table grapes and wines, to fight for the rights of workers.

Last fall, recognizing the need for support of the U.F.W. in this area, members of the Committee on Poverty, organized the Juan de la Cruz Boycott Committee. Since that time the committee has just been responsible for picket lines at several chain stores resulting in chain wide committments in support and recognition of the UFW from Stop & Shop, Finast, Food Mart and Big-Y-Jumbo. Committee members have given teach-ins to classes, community groups and dormitory residents. Money has been raised to support the strike fund for those workers who are unable to find other work during the strike.

Despite the committee's effectiveness so far, more student support is needed. The strike will be reaching a crucial point in the next few months as contracts are being signed and as the rowing season begins again. Students are needed to support us on picket lines, on delegations to stores, with letters to the management of scab stores and with the boycott of all table grapes, all non-union western lettuce and all Gallo, Guild and Franzia wines.

Madden's UMass lament

To The Editor:

Scrape the walls and paint the cement. We're being fed cookies and milk but of course it looks like regurgitated pulp and the printed word. We are required to swim through the paranoidal brain waves of this system which projects knowledge to us all through a requirement clause or should I say inertia or should I say anything.

Anyway, little diplomas will come tapdancing down clean angular stairs into the awaiting arms of an army of joe stylized hair cuts and frosted lipped Americans who have gotten over the "bad times" and are once more joyously returning to the fabulous fifties with a seventies veneer.

Over and over again like memory, I hear voices whispering and cajoling:

you rote yourself to death here
you rote yourself to death here...
(chorus repeat)

Peering over the grassy spaces, I see myself and my fellow students stepping over the mud, to the left, to the right and yet walk so comfortably on the cement security. We head straight to the embryo of modern education: the lecture hall.

Please friends and bottle heads remember, as you swim swam swum here and lick (lack and luck out) the figures dripping from your required professor's hands, that if a huge potato masher came durging down out of the sky and landed with an impressive gathoosh, we'd all be collective strawberry preserves.

Euro trip cheap

To The Editor:

Seats are still available on the summer Five College charter flight Boston-London, June 18-August 21 at only $253 round trip. As student and youth fares no longer exist, this is among the cheapest trans-Atlantic travel available.

All full-time students at the University (or at other accredited colleges or universities) who plan to be in Europe in the coming year are urged to purchase International Identity Cards from the Office of International Programs, 239 Whitmore. For the modest price of $2.00, a card enables you to use low-cost student intra-European travel and to have discount prices on admission to theatres, chateaux, museums, and student hotels and restaurants.

The International Programs Office also has information on the International Student Employment Service sponsored by the Council on International Educational Exchange. This service provides advice on work opportunities in Ireland, England, Australia, Israel, Finland, Norway and Germany.

It is not too late to apply for UMass summer overseas programs in Bologna, Italy; Coimbra, Portugal; Pau, France; Freiburg, Germany; and Oxford, England. For information contact the International Programs Office, 239 Whitmore.

Dam makes waste

To The Editor:

Of all the recent disastrous "solutions" to the energy crisis, few are more obviously an environmental mistake than the proposed Dickey-Lincoln hydroelectric project in Northern Maine. (The last time this Corps of Engineers project received widespread press coverage, the issue was private vs. public power. The power potentially generated by the two dams would be made available to publicly-owned utilities, R.E.A., etc., rather than the private companies.)

Eager to offer positive solutions in a tight energy situation, New England Congressmen are now flocking to the banner of the newly revived, government-sponsored project.

"Just a few years ago, Dickey-Lincoln didn't make any sense from a cost point of view," said Congressman Paul Cronin (R-Andover) recently at the UMass campus in Amherst. "Today it's very feasible...it has the capacity to provide us with a billion kilowatts of electrical power every year."

The magic figure of 1.1 billion kilowatt hours of electric power per year needs to be seen in perspective. New England consumption in 1972 was 64 billion kilowatt hours. Projected consumption for New England in 1980 is approximately 100 kwh. Thus, the 1.1 billion kwh per year would amount to about 1 per cent of 1980 consumption. This would have a negligible the New England electrical energy supply. As years go by, if consumption continues to rise at the rates we are told to expect, this 1 per cent, and so on. Eventually, due to silting, no hydroelectric power at all will be produced. Even if this power were given away free, it could only reduce utility bills by 1 per cent or less.

The dams would inundate and destroy 150 sq. mi. of the Great Maine Woods celebrated by Thoreau. Two-thirds (75 miles) of the Upper St. John River would be flooded. At certain times of the year, drawdown of the water would turn one third of this 150 sq. mi. into barren mud flats, the now infamous bathtub ring. Destruction of this large wilderness area would mean loss of habitat for a sizable moose population, eliminate scores of deer yards, and constitute a major ecological disruption for many other species. The Upper St. Johns River and its tributaries (Big Black River, with 65 miles affected, Little Black, 25 miles, Pocwock, 7 miles, Chimenticook, 4 miles, plus 65 miles of less well-known streams) are now outstanding for canoeing and brook trout fishing. In addition, the timber resources are now harvested and, if wisely managed, can sustain themselves indefinitely. In 1955, the Federal Inter-Agency Committee recommended that this area should be set aside to preserve its "unique upland wilderness character, its outstanding scenic and geological features, mountain peaks, lakes, forest and marshlands."

Dollar estimates of cost vary with point of view. Proponents tend to cite low estimates; Senator Hathaway of Maine, for instance, claims it will cost a mere $275 million. Boston Edison, on the other hand, has estimated the cost at $1 billion. The Corps of Engineers gives $356 million as its cost estimate; this does not include transmission lines. The Corps has also figured a recreational plus on its cost-benefit analysis, a point of view very much subject to question. Whatever the cost, the Corps certainly cannot build another wilderness to replace the one we already have.

How much better it would be to invest that money in research of promising alternative energy sources such as wind and direct solar energy. How much wiser to spend it on a thorough-going conservation program aimed at reducing electrical energy waste, promoting energy-efficient practices in design and maintainance of buildings, low-cost loans for storm windows and insulation, and for installation of roof-top solar units for space and water heating. How about converting a solid-waste problem into an energy resource; European cities have done it for years. Present rate structures encourage waste of electricity by charging less, the more one uses; this should be changed. These means could more than compensate for the 1 per cent of predicted demand for which the Dickey-Lincoln project would provide.

I hope the New England Caucus will look behind the glossy surface in the Dickey-Lincoln issue and re-examine their support where they have given it. I am convinced they will find this is a fool's bargain and that support of the Dickey-Lincoln project is indefensible. Constituents should write their Congressmen, voicing their opposition to the Dickey-Lincoln hydroelectric project and support of designating the Upper St. John River a national wilderness waterway.

Existential Al's

IF YOU CAN'T SPEAK ENGLISH PLEASE WRITE IT DOWN.

The sign above was the first thing that I saw as I sat with April and Chris at "Al's Grinder Shop" in Washington D.C. After a long drive to the Capitol, it was a mixture of fatigue and hunger which led us to seek refuge in this most unlikely spot three blocks from the UMass dormitory for interns in D.C., and four hundred and fifty miles from home.

Sitting in a booth, we eventually ordered a pizza, and watched and reacted to a steady procession of characters and events.

The proprieter of the store, was a tall heavy set muscular guy named Al. Smoothly and with confidence he greeted all orders and situations. He answered the phone like Jack Lord; his mannerisms were a mixture of Dan Blocker and Clark Gable, and he ran his food establishment as if it were a diversion.

Diversion, In this case the world would seem to indicate an escape from reality. Yet to us it seemed like Al was creating his own type of reality. On the wall next to the "If you can't speak English.." sign another hand written announcement requested "Please Act Human." (Noticing this we watched the motion, movement and local color that was "Al's.")

Like Jack Dempsey at this restaurant a man greeted all guests as they walked in. Hugging the inside of a booth a tiny man who might have been a mongoloid, grumbled to himself and kept a continual squint as he peered up and down the aisle for refuse on empty tables. He was "Al's" equivalant to a "bus boy" and because of his various peculiarities we nicknamed him "Geico".

Another character who stands out is "Joe". Joe looks and acts like a "man of knowledge" who lost both his money and his marbles in the famous Wall Street Crash.

At one point Joe took out a Black Flair and wrote an extensive I.O.U. to Al to pay for a cup of coffee. He settled into a booth and looked over wrinkled pieces of paper as he emptied out his wallet in search of something which to interpret rationally would be as corrupt as perhaps foolish. As he handed his intricate I.O.U. to Al he said "This is as good as legal tender." Al barked back, "It's no good for nothing". But he accepted it.

Standing by the booth were three of Al's "delivery boys". One a tall strong black man with a perpetual grin leaned relaxed against the counter. He looked a lot like Jim Brown as he fondled a slinky toy, much the same way that Humphrey Bogart fondled brass balls in The Caine Mutiny.

A second delivery boy was a bloated clown-like character with slick hair, a Georgetown sweatshirt and elephant pants that were ripped at the bottom from his continual stepping on them.

Perhaps the most interesting character of all was a young man who sat at the counter. He couldn't have been more than twelve years old. As he sipped his soda, his eyes and mannerisms seemed tragically much older then his years. As he bantered with Al over a chess game he answered many jokes and questions with the simple response: "Sheeeeeiiiiitttd-dd".

And the characters interacted. Geico moved to the back of the store and brushed by Joe who was talking into a receiver even though nobody was on the other end. "Keep this guy away from me," Joe moaned to Al. "I'm doing important business, and you know how this guy always bothers me!" Geico retreated back to the front, his face contorted, he was hunched and spewing off strange sounds, and was very reminiscent of Anthony Quinn in The Hunchback of Notre Dame.

Joe moved up to the counter and whispered to Al, "I got a hot tip for you. A good investment". Al responded with a comical scowl, and told Joe something to the extent of "you know where you can put your tip", and Joe marched off with comical indignation, "Ah you don't have no money to invest anyhow".

Al then turned to Geico, and the conversation went something like this:

Al: Hey what do you want to eat?
Geico: eey oohio hrte &&5$q quite.
Al: What did you say?
Geico: eey oohio hrte &&&5$q ute!
Al: That's what I thought you said..be ready in ten minutes.

And the whole night was like that. Like a scene out of King of Hearts. Some would call it "surreal," perhaps existential, or a lost fantasy. I don't know. Those words seem to classify experiences, and define them.

Here two miles down from the White House and the Capital, "Al's" world was untouched by the issue of impeachment, Nixon, or the workings of government.

The next day Chris and I went to watch the House of Representatives. They were debating a bill dealing with the bussing issue. They reminded both of us of a petty and chaotic P.T.A. meeting, and we concluded that in camparison "Al's" World, spared the facade of propriety was much more honest, and much more real.

For the birds

If a man was meant to fly, he would have been born with wings, or something like that, so the saying goes.

I love to fly. Well, actually I used to love to fly. I loved to fly when I was fifteen and could pass myself off as being twelve years old because the fare was half price. I used to love to fly when the airlines had Youth Fare and sometimes I got a seat in first class when the tourist section was all filled up. I used to love to fly when the captain of the airplane would point out that we were flying over Cuba and how I wished we could be hijacked there so I could pick up a few cigars for my friends. I used to love to fly when someone would bring a bottle of Vodka and we would deplete the plane's orange juice supplies. I used to love to fly when you could listen to music over the headphones, instead of some drunken salesman.

Remembering how much I used to love to fly, I decided to do it again. Now it was the airlines' turn to get back at me for all the shenanigans I had pulled.

After being assigned to a seat, I had to go through security. Now I'm as insecure as the next person, but do I have to be registered? "But we have to check you in case you're carrying a gun," they told me. The last gun I had was a water pistol, and it backfired on me. I know my limitations.

Take-off is always a nerve-racking experience but when the head flight attendent yells out, "Weeeee, we're off" I began to wonder what she's had to drink.

I think I sprouted a few grey hairs when we hit some air pockets. The captain said, "It's getting a wee bit bumpy out there, isn't it?"

My stomach was taking the dives along with the airplane. I pushed the button for one of the attendents. "I'd like a coloring book and some crayons, please," I said, thinking that they would calm me down.

"I'm sorry," she said snottily, "But those are for children."

"But I'm still a child," I said, "At least that's what my mother said when I moved out."

"I don't think you're very funny," she said.

I pushed the button again and another attendent came along just long enought to put out the light and say, "I'm not your flight attendent." Meanwhile I could see through the curtain that there were four attendents for three first class travelers. Is this any way to run an airlines?

I don't know. Maybe the airlines is getting back at me. Maybe I should leave flying for the birds and be content with terrestial pleasures.

Save water

By SAM HASSAN

Most people at UMass are aware of and hopefully concerned about a water crisis the town of Amherst is faced with. Because the University consumes over one-half of the town's water, UMass officials must come up with solutions to the problems, but they haven't. In fact their activity thus far can only be described as mismanaged non-performance.

When I say mismanaged Conservation Commission Member Edward Simpson's Feb. 27 Collegian statement about being too busy saving energy to save water, and also to Chancellor Bromery's overt blindness to water and sewage problems in the town.

There are two major problems. One is overconsumption, with the other being resultant overflows from the sewage plant. The overflow from the plant runs into Mill River. You may remember reading about the four thirsty hockey players who ended up at the Infirmary after partaking of the pond.

The safe amount of daily water use for Amherst is 4.5 million gallons per day, but the projected peak usage for this summer is 4.8 million gallons a day. At the same time the sewage treatment plant can only handle 4.25 million gallons per day. Thus it appears we're using too much water, and in doing so, destroying what we have left.

Environmental damage from partially or untreated sewage can vary from a destruction of animal life to a creation or stimulus for water plant growth, but we should most importantly become actively concerned with water conservation. If we do, we can solve both problems.

I'm not going to suggest three minute showers or that you flush toilets every second time, but there is a tremendous individual waste that multiplied by 25,000 is our problem.

With conservation in mind I suggest the following.

Men who shave with a blade should clean out the sink and fill it up rather than run the faucet. Some men may take five minutes to shave and run the water for six. It shouldn't happen but it does.

To become actively concerned about our water shortage you should simply take a drink. Hopefully it will taste better than the last one you had, and hopefully you won't waste water rinsing out a perfectly clean glass before filling it.

While the town of Amherst is looking for ways to supply water and meet sewage demands, the administration should be working toward water conservation. People at the University must be made aware of the problems and conservation measures should be pointedly encouraged and practiced by all of us.

Thesis exhibitions displayed in Herter

Thesis exhibitions, the art department's annual multi-media art experience, began at the Herter Hall Gallery Sunday.

Running almost solidly through June 1, ceramists, painters, printmakers and sculptors completing work for Master of Fine Arts and Bachelor of Fine Arts degrees will mount one-week shows as part of their thesis requirements.

Each will open with a Sunday session from 2 to 5 p.m. and run through the following week, Monday through Friday. The weekday hours are 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. except Friday, when each show closes at 1 p.m.

The exhibitions are open to the public without charge. Interspersed will be several special exhibitions by the Fine Arts Council or others in the UMass arts community. A complete schedule is available from the Art Department office in Bartlett Hall or the Fine Arts Council office in Herter Hall.

'Fish Zone' in SU Gallery

Jim Beatman, yesterday in the gallery set up an environment which he named "Fish Zone." This is the first of a series of programs to expose the university community to the presence of artists and their interests. Bags of Goldfish were hung at varying eye levels so that each viewer was at some point directly confronted. The environment was meant to be a non-analytical, non-sensical piece. The overtones or mood of the piece was magical, sometimes childish since most children have at some time experienced the goldfish as a pet.

People entering the room were awed, smiling and resting in this comfortable non-treatening place.

College recruiting: activity up

Despite concerns about the energy crisis, college recruiting activity is continuing well ahead of last year's pace, according to Robert J. Morrissey, placement officer at the University of Massachusetts in Amherst, one of 156 colleges and universities throughout the United States participating in the College Placement Council's Salary Survey.

The Council's mid-season report, just released, indicates that engineering condidates and to a lesser degree accounting candidates are still being pursued most vigorously.

Indicative of this is the fact that, at the bachelor's level, engineering candidates received 59 percent of the total offers reported in the survey, while another 18 percent went to accounting majors. Of the remainder, 12 percent were made to general business and marketing majors, 6 percent to biological and physical science majors, and 5 percent to humanities and social sciences majors.

Overall, 26 percent more job offers were reported at the bachelor's-degree level than at the same point last year. Other increases were 2 percent at the master's and 12 percent at the doctoral levels.

The CPC survey is based on offers, not acceptances, made to students in selected curricula and graduate programs during the normal recruiting period, September to June. Three reports are issued each year--in January, March, and July.

Although small in total numbers, humanities, social sciences, biological sciences, computer science, mathematics, and other physical and earth sciences categories all experienced increases in volume. The most active employer groups so far this season are public accounting firms, followed by the chemicals and petroleum groups.

Notes and quotes

(Left to Right) Bob Wooten, Mary Scoledge, Norman Brown, Carolyn Schade, Luann Barry, Judy Leamon, Steve Mosco, Steve Rourke in rehearsal for the UMass Music Theatre production of DAMES AT SEA.

"Dames At Sea"

The UMass Music Theatre Guild is producing the musical "DAMES AT SEA", Wednesday through Saturday, April 3, 4, 5 and 6, in Bowker Auditorium at 8 p.m. The production is under the stage direction of Anne Drecktrah, with musical direction of Jim Cruthers and choreography by Beverly Scarpace.

DAMES AT SEA, written by George Haimsohn and Robin Miller, with music by Jim Wise, is a delightful parody of the great Hollywood musicals of the 1930's. A take-off on the Ruby Keeler-Dick Powell "All Singing", "All Dancing" Extravaganzas, the simple plot concerns a star-struck girl Ruby (alternately played by Mary Scoledge and Judy Leamon) who comes to the big city and falls in love with sailor-songwriter Dick (played by Norman A. Brown). Plot complications are provided by the on-again, off-again romance of Dick's pal, Lucky (Steve Moscoe) with Joan (Carolyn Schade), the gum-chewing chorus girl with the heart of gold.

Tickets are now available and on sale at the Fine Arts Council Box Office, and are priced at $1.50 for students and $2.50 for all others. Special discount rates for groups of over 20 high school students are also available. Information can be obtained by calling 545-0202.

Black music

The business aspects of Black Music will be discussed by Jimmy Owens, a professional musician from New York, in a seminar tonight, from 7-10 p.m. in Dickinson Lounge.

The discussion, which will include a question and answer session will cover business aspects, recording statistics, and music archtypes.

Following the presentation, Mr. Owens, a trumpet player who has performed with Hervie Mann, Art Blakey, and the David Frost Show Orchestra, will perform.

Both the performance and seminar are open to the public.

Hundreds of American students placed in RECOGNIZED OVERSEAS MEDICAL SCHOOLS through Euromed!

For the session starting July, 1974, Euromed will assist qualified American students in gaining admission to recognized overseas medical schools.

And that's just the beginning.

Since the language barrier constitutes the preponderate difficulty in succeeding at a foreign school, the Euromed program also includes an intensive 12-16 week medical and conversational language course, mandatory for all students. Five hours daily, 5 days per week (12-16 weeks) the course is given in the country where the student will attend medical school.

In addition, Euromed provides students with a 12-16 week intensive cultural orientation program, with American students now studying medicine in that particular country serving as counselors.

Senior or graduate students currently enrolled in an American university are eligible to participate in the Euromed program.

Facts on hepatitis

A recent epidemic of hepatitis which hit 93 per cent of the Holy Cross football team illustrates that hepatitis is not exclusive to developing nations and drug addicts. In fact, peak incidence of hepatitis occurs between 15-24 years of age — certainly within the college years. Although we have had no epidemic here at UMass, there are always a few students who develop hepatitis each semester. According to Judy Sharpe, University Health Services Public Health nurse, 5 cases of hepatitis have been reported this semester. There may have been other students with such a mild case of hepatitis that it went unnoticed or was chalked up to the "flu" or "overworking."

Hepatitis is believed to be a viral illness which attacks liver cells. Researchers feel that there are two separate virus types of disease. The Type A or infectious hepatitis is the most common form among students. It has a short incubation period of 2-6 weeks (average 30-33 days) and is transmitted by eating contaminated food or drinking polluted water or exposing oneself to infected waste material. It is most commonly transmitted by close contact with an infected person. Close contact involves exposure to potential fecal-oral routes of the disease, including sexual contact and using the same eating utensils and poor bathroom sanitation and hygiene.

The Type B of the serum type of hepatitis tends to be more serious, but is less common in a college population and has a 3-6 month incubation period. It is primarily spread thru contaminated hyperdermic blood-needles, transfusions, and menstrual blood.

The symptoms of infectious hepatitis (Type A) vary according to the severity of the illness. Early symptoms, which may be the only indication of the disease in mild cases, are nausea, vomiting, diarrhea, weight loss, loss of appetite, fever, and loss of taste for cigarettes. The most obvious signs of clinical disease are jaundice (yellowing of the skin and-or whites of the eyes), darkening of the urine to a tea color, lightening of the bowel movements to a greyish-white color, generalized itching, and tenderness of the liver. When such symptoms occur, check with a physician. Since the symptoms of hepatitis are similar to other diseases, a blood test is necessary for definite diagnosis.

The duration of the illness is variable. Most symptoms subside in one to three weeks. However, it may take months for the liver to heal completely. There is no specific treatment for hepatitis. Bed rest is important while the symptoms are present. In more severe cases, some limitation of physical activity is also advised after the symptoms subside. To aid the liver's healing process, a nutritious, high caloric diet with sufficient protein is recommended. Alcohol should be avoided until the liver has had a chance to regenerate itself.

The control of hepatitis is based on measures geared to break the fecal-oral route of transmission. Close contact with an infected person should be avoided for at least one week after the jaundice begins. Persons with the disease should not share kitchen utensils or clothing. They should make certain to wash their hands after eating or using the bathroom. Careful sanitation and personal hygiene should be practiced by all members of the household, particularly around bathrooms and kitchens. People who travel to areas where the disease is always present should avoid potential sources of contaminated food or water.

No vaccine is presently available to actively immunize against either Hepatitis A or B. Persons closely exposed to Hepatitis A can be partially protected by injection of gamma globulin administered as soon as possible after exposure.

Dear Aggie

How to bury a fly??

Dear Aggie,

I have a grave problem. My pet fly Herman died and I don't know the correct way to bury a fly. I know that I will have a wake, but should I have it outside by some of the playgrounds the dogies left for him or in the trash room where he offend went to dinner? Please tell me the correct place to put his coffin and tombstone also. Thank you for any help you can give me.

Buggie

Dear Buggie,

It's funny you should ask. Just last week I was confronted with a similar problem — only the man wanted to know how to buy a kangaroo. It seems that he was having problems with the tail. But to the problem at hand. I think a nice place to have a wake for a fly would be a chapel in the woods — near a swamp, maybe. You know how flies like to breed there. I would say the best place to bury a fly would be a fly cemetary. If you don't know where the nearest fly cemetary is, you should either call your nearest mortuary or start one in your own back yard. They're not very hard. Just use a little wall of garbage about ½" high around a specific area, place a little sign with the name of your burial grounds upon it and put it near your entrance. Of course his coffin and tombstone would be placed within your cemetary. The usual depth of burial is 6", as opposed to 6'. And for a tombstone, may I suggest the first part of a chocolate Hersey bar (just the letter H, for Herman), lamenated, so it will keep. They're very chic for dead pets with names beginning with any of those letters. And Buggie, you have my condolences.

Dear Aggie,

My father passed away recently of a heart attack upon learning of my mother's death in the fire that burned our recently paid for house and all our belongings to the ground. My only daughter is in the hospital recovering from a broken arm, leg, hip, wrist, pelvis, and nose, and my son cannot leave the halfway house for the funeral. My problem is that my husband wants to bring his girlfriend and her six kids to the funeral. I feel that this would be in poor taste, and that she should leave the kids at home. What do you think?

Sunny

Dear Sunny,

I agree.

A Two Point Program To Stop Pollution.

The Litter Point.
Someone just tossed a can on the ground. Use this point to point it out. Maybe next time he'll toss it in a litter basket.
The Air Pollution Point.
Don't close your eyes to that smoking smokestack. Point it out to someone who can do something about it.

People start pollution. People can stop it.

Bruins call up five players

BOSTON (AP) - The Boston Bruins have called up five players from their American Hockey League affiliate, the Boston Braves, "to provide injury insurance during the coming Stanley Cup playoffs."

The Bruins, who won first place in the East Division of the National Hockey League, announced the call-ups Monday.

Brought up were: goalie Dave Reece, former University of Vermont star; wingers Dave Hynes, formerly of Harvard, and Bob Gryp, formerly of Boston University; center Doug Gibson, and defenseman Al Simmons. The five are scheduled to make the Bruins' last road trip-to Chicago for Wednesday's game and to Montreal for a game Saturday-and to travel with the team during the playoffs.

The last game of the regular season for the Bruins will be Sunday night at Boston Garden against the Toronto Maple Leafs, the team Boston will meet three days later for the beginning of the best-of-seven East Division quarter-final Stanley Cup playoff series.

Sox trump Cards 5-4

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. (AP) — Rico Petrocelli lined a two-run homer off former teammate Mike Garman with two out in the ninth inning Monday, lifting the Boston Red Sox to a 5-4 exhibition victory over the St. Louis Cardinals.

Petrocelli drilled his shot into a stiff crosswind after Cecil Cooper had worked a walk on a 3-2 pitch by Garman, traded to the Cardinals last fall.

The veteran third baseman also had a hustling double on a hit to left, driving in a run in a three-run fifth off another former Boston right-hander, Sonny Siebert.

Siebert worked his way out of a bases-loaded jam in the fourth, but ran into control trouble in the fifth. He walked two and Carl Yastrzemski singled across one run. Petrocelli brought home the second and then Siebert balked home the third.

Southpaw Bill Lee worked the first seven innings for the Red Sox. He was nicked for single runs in the second and third and then two unearned tallies in the seventh when the Red Sox were guilty of two errors.

Veteran reliever Diego Segui, acquired from St. Louis, picked up the victory, blanking the Cards on one scratch hit in the last two innings and helping hike Boston's exhibition record to 17-7.

Former Boston slugger Reggie Smith had a double and two singles for the Cardinals.

The Red Sox wind up their preseason schedule with games in Winter Haven Tuesday and Wednesday. Rick Wise will pitch against the Minnesota Twins Tuesday, with relievers Rogelio Moret, Dick Drago and Segui down to go three innings each against the Montreal Expos Wednesday.

'62 Sox revisited

Ah, the nostalgia craze.

It's sweeping the country. The Great Gatsby is getting the most advance publicity since Kohoutek. Two-thirds of the Andrews sisters are back in the limelight. Rock Around The Clock is again on the Top 40 charts. And with a sentimental trip back to 1962, American Graffiti has captured the hearts of America.

Speaking of '62, all the nostalgic Red Sox freaks have been clamoring for the Collegian to reprint the famous spring training preview of that year, written by staff baseball correspondent, Sue Icidesqueeze.

Her article became a classic in reportorial circles, mainly because it was so bad. Time has proven just about every one of her observations wrong. She was the worst judge of baseball talent to come along since Harry Frazee (the guy who traded Ruth).

So, here's this Oldie-But-Baddie:

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz. — The Red Sox break camp today and head north with a ballclub that will definitely crack the first division.

Manager Mike Higgins, implementing his rebuilding system masterfully, has molded what will probably be the surprise club of 1962. Higgins is in his seventh season as Sox mentor and, the way he is coaching, will be around for seven more.

Spearheading the club will be Don Schwall, last season's AL Rookie of the Year, who is certainly headed toward superstardom. Schwall leads a strong pitching staff comprised of such notables as Galen Cisco, Ike Delock, Arnie Earley, Chet Nichols, Bill Monboquette, and Gene Conley. Also going north will be Dick Radatz, who should be made into a starter — he just can't cut it as a reliever, and Earl Wilson, who is just up for a cup of coffee.

Pitchers Tracy Stallard, Stew MacLeod, and "Crow" Spanswick failed to make the club, and one has to question Higgins' judgement when he sends down such promising hurlers while keeping such obvious losers as Radatz and Wilson.

Two moundmen that were cut and deserved it, however, were Dave Morehead and Wilbur Wood. Morehead looked poor in the exhibitions, and he can best be described one way: He'll never pitch a no-hitter.

Wood has an attitude problem. He refuses to concentrate on his fastball and curve, and instead spends his time monkeying around with a fool knuckleball. All he'll get with his knuckler is a job at a car wash.

The infield is Pete Runnels at first, Frankie Malzone at third. Ed Bressoud at short, and of course at second Chuck Schilling. With the slick fielding Schilling the Sox at set at that sack for the next ten years.

Pumpsie Green can fill in capable at second when Schilling needs a rest.

And lest no one forget super-utilityman Don Gile (pronounced Jee-Lee), who does everything but drive the bullpen cart. He hit a strong .278 last year.

Russ Nixon (.289), Jim Pagliaroni, and rookie Bob Tillman form a capable catching corps while Lou Clinton, Gary Geiger, Carroll Hardy (good enough to pinch hit for Ted Williams last year), and Dave Philley will patrol the outfield this year.

Carl Yastrzemski is coming off a fairly good rookie season in which he hit .266, but it is doubtful that he'll ever surpass that mark again. He holds his bat too high to ever become a constant hitter.

The Sox open at home versus a much improved Cleveland club Tuesday, April 10. The game will be broadcast on WHDH by Curt Gowdy, an announcer who, with his Wyoming drawl, will never get far in the business.

Alley-oop David Thompson named college player of year

By KEN RAPPOPORT

NEW YORK (AP) — David Thompson, leader of the Pack, whose gorgeous "alley-oop" shots brought a national basketball championship to North Carolina State, was named The Associated Press College Player of the Year Monday.

The Wolfpack's golden forward took the play away from UCLA's Bill Walton, who had won the glamorous award two years running.

Thompson, a 6-foot-4 player who leaps like a seven-footer— or maybe eight — collected 128 votes to 85 for Walton from the nation's sports writers and broadcasters.

They were the only players in the race. Nine others got one vote each.

Thompson's special talents drew raves from hometown and hostile fans alike all season. He averaged more than 26 points a game, many of them on a unique ability to float high over the basket and drop in a field goal after talking a lob pass.

DAVID THOMPSON

The "alley-oop" shot became standard fare for the basketball-crazy crowds that watched North Carolina State win the Atlantic Coast Conference championship, then the national title.

The junior forward scored 28 points to lead the Wolfpack over UCLA in the National Collegiate Athletic Association's semifinal playoffs, this despite a 15-stitch gash in his scalp suffered when he crashed to the floor in the first half of the East Regional final against Pitt.

Then Thompson took North Carolina State to the championship with 21 points as the Wolfpack beat Marquette 76-64 in the national finals.

Walton, a 6-11 center who dominated college basketball the last two years, was also the heart of UCLA this year. His Bruins, though, weren't as perfect in the 1973-74 season as in the past two years.

The cocky senior, the likely No. 1 pro pick, scored over 19 points a game and averaged about 15 rebounds.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

The Pisces woman is subtle, hypnotic, appears quiet but can be volcanic. She can write poetry while soaking her feet. She can gently caress while coolly planning the future. She is psychic, emotional and capable of reporting in diamond-hard prose.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Creative urge is awakened. Your style comes across. Your personal magnetism soars and opposite sex "feels" it. Change of scenery is due. New contacts prove fruitful. Be independent in thought, action. Generation gap will be bridged.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You deal with persons who seem committed to traditional methods. Stick to what you know. Don't rock boat. Those who control budget want to be reassured. Be thorough where details are concerned. Check locations, property values.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Your natural versatility comes to fore—your ideas are tested. You gain opportunity to spread emotional wings. Avoid trying too much simultaneously. Be selective. Open lines of communication. Refuse to be restricted by one who is envious.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Be realistic about money. Take inventory. Review tax picture. Get what's coming to you. Insist on quality. Mere promises now will not suffice. Leo, Aquarius and Scorpio individuals figure prominently. State case in forthright manner.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Lunar cycle continues high—you communicate, sparkle, change, have more appeal, especially where opposite sex is concerned. Be conspicuous; wear bright colors. Lead rather than follow. Sense of showmanship will be evident.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Soft-sell approach is best—build bridge of goodwill. There are meetings behind scenes which could directly affect your welfare. Taurus, Libra individuals are featured. Know difference between illusion and reality. Find out who has feet on ground.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Emphasis remains on romantic notions, creativity, refinement of techniques. Study Virgo message. Determine who is victim of self-deception. Look beyond surface indications. You may be dealing with classical "con man."

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Power play is likely to be in picture. You have more strength on your side than might be imagined. You will be given chance to advance, to handle additional responsibility. Don't play games. Emotional, and other stakes, are high. You get more money but you won't get it for nothing.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Lunar aspect is such that you bridge gaps, overcome language or communication barriers. You get message across in dynamic manner. Aries, Libra persons figure prominently. You will be completing a project which can build prestige.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): The occult, what is hidden or obscured is apt to command attention. Check accounts. New view in dealing with partner, mate is a necessity. Leo, Aquarius persons may play featured roles. Don't fear the unknown. If you ask intelligent questions, answers will be forthcoming.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): You know instinctively that a slowdown will be beneficial. Now, do something about it. Pull in reins. You have right to get to know mate, partner. You also have right—a need—to rediscover you. Contractual obligation will be fulfilled.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Reach beyond what appears to be a limitation. Applies to social life as well as other areas. Sagittarius, Gemini persons could be in picture. You are earning respect of associates, even if they don't gush over you.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you are more emotional than many might suspect. You tend to brood about the past. You are loyal to family, so much so that in some cases you have buried your opportunities. August should be your significant month of 1974. You draw to you persons born under Capricorn and Cancer.

HOW DO YOU THINK MOST PEOPLE YOUR AGE DIE?

It's not drugs.
It's not suicide.
And it's not cancer.
It's automobile crashes.
More American people between the ages of 15 and 25 die in automobile crashes than in any other way.
At least half of those deaths are alcohol related. And the drunk drivers who cause most of them are under 25. Sometimes, many times, they kill themselves.
One of the most dangerous things you can do is get drunk and drive home.
You can change it. You have to.
You march against the war.
You fight for clean air and clean water. You eat natural foods. You practice yoga. You are so much for life. And you are so much against killing.
It would be unthinkable for you to wittingly kill another human being.
So then, why is this happening?

WFL and CFL

The Toronto Northmen of the WFL probably clinched themselves the league's championship by signing the Dolphin Trio of Jim Kiick, Larry Csonka, and Paul Warfield, last weekend. There's no word yet on what trophy they'll win but word has it that the Northmen may be forced to pay a fee to Don Shula's son so that he'll still be able to get an education. The way things look Shula may not even have the heart to play with his son's NFL player cards.

Shula is sick and with good reason. Three of his best players, two of which are the best at their respective positions in the NFL, have said money is more important than any old ideas such as allegiance, or loyalty to a team, and who can blame them? It's every man for himself these days and if you can give yourself financial security for the rest of your life you might as well take it.

But if you think Don Shula is sick, John Bassett, the owner of the Northmen is even sicker.

You see there's another football team in Toronto called the Argonauts. They play in the Canadian Football league, the only instrument of national sports identity that Canadians have. And certain people are afraid that the Northmen will help to destroy the CFL.

One of them, the most vocal of the anti-Northmen group is Marc Lalonde the Minister of Health, Education, and Welfare and the man responsible for sports in Canada.

Lalonde fears that the Northmen will help destroy the CFL. If the fans flock to CNE Stadium-the place where the Northmen will be playing, they'll realize that the CFL brank of football is inferior to that played in the States. The resulting disaffection with Canadian football will raise the cry for WFL franchises and NFL franchises and spell the death knell for the CFL in Lalonde's opinion.

Lalonde has promised that he will fight to keep the WFL out of Canada by parliamentary legislation. However, in so doing he is the worst hypocrite in Canadian history.

Up to 1968 there was a franchise of the Continental Football League in Toronto and nobody gave a damn. It was an American-owned league just as the WFL is but there were no government officials who sprang up in blind nationalist fervor against it.

Furthermore, Lalonde will have a lot of explaining to do if he kicks the Northmen out. He'll have to explain himself to all the Toronto fans who are dying to see quality football for the first time in their lives. He'll also have to explain himself to his critics throughout the country who will demand to know how the government can pass legislation which is such a blantant disregard of their rights.

But the biggest explanation will have to go to Canadian nationalists who for so long have been ranting and raving against American-owned companies operating in Canada and have continually demanded that the Canadian economy be all-Canadian blissfully forgetting that without the United States the unemployment rate in Canada would be about 25 per cent of the work force.

Without American investment, Canada would almost surely still be a wasteland, because there is just not enough Canadian money to produce a modern, profit-making economy.

They (nationalists) will want to know why Lalonde considers it more important to get rid of a football team than much more evident American companies. He won't be able to answer the question.

I'll answer it for him. I'm sick and tired of stupid, moronic politicians who keep tooting on their chauvinistic horns crying out against American "exploitation."

The Northmen and American capital must stay in Canada or there just might no be a Canada anymore.

Whalers drop finale, 4-1

BOSTON (AP) - The New England Whalers bid farewell to Boston Monday night on a down note by dropping a 4-1 decision to the Houston Aeros in World Hockey Association action at the Boston Garden as the largest crowd in Whalers history, 14,711 looked on.

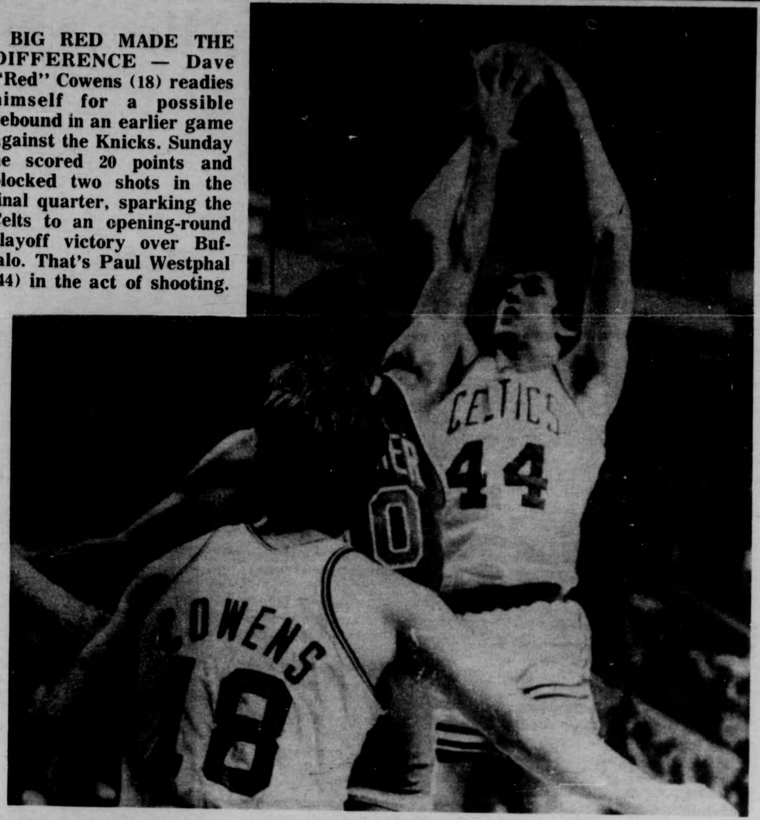
The WHA West champion Aeros, sparked by two second-period goals from Don Grierson just 55 seconds apart, dominated their counterpart in the East as both teams ended their regular seasons.

The Whalers now go on to Springfield for the playoffs before moving into their new arena in Hartford, Conn., next season.

Hugh Harris put the Whalers ahead on a breakaway 1:36 into the game for the solo score of the first period.

Grierson notched his first goal at 7:13 of the middle stanza from a faceoff only two seconds after New England goalie Al Smith stopped Frank Hughes on a penalty shot. Grierson got the game winner at 8:08 from a perfect centering pass.

Bill Prentice and Jack Stanfield added insurance for Houston with the only scores of the final period.



BIG RED MADE THE DIFFERENCE — Dave "Red" Cowens (18) readies himself for a possible rebound in an earlier game against the Knicks. Sunday he scored 20 points and blocked two shots in the final quarter, sparking the Celts to an opening-round playoff victory over Buffalo. That's Paul Westphal (44) in the act of shooting.

Braves confident vs. Celts

BUFFALO (AP) — The Buffalo Braves, hoping to even their National Basketball Association playoffs with the Boston Celtics at one game apiece, appear optimistic.

Boston's come-from-behind, fourth quarter rally beat the Braves 107-97 in Boston Saturday night.

"I think the way we played against them for three periods showed our guys that we can beat them," Coach Jack Ramsay said.

"I thought it was a good game for us," said forward Jim McMilliam. "We didn't show a lack of poise. I thought the guys handled themselves well."

The Celtics and Braves play the second game of the best-of-seven first-round playoff series here Tuesday night.

The Braves looked unbeatable for a time in Boston Saturday. They grabbed an early lead, held it, and ran up their margin to as high as 17 points in the third quarter.

Then, with the Boston Garden fans whooping it up, the Celtics shot ahead in the fourth period, outscoring the Braves 38-16.

Boston center Dave Cowens was the difference. He scored 20 of his 30 points and grabbed nine of his 18 rebounds in the final quarter. He also blocked a shot and stole the ball twice.

Leaman lands HS standouts

Amherst: University of Massachusetts Basketball Coach Jack Leaman announced last Wednesday that Derick Claiborne and Alex Eldridge, both of William Taft High School, Bronx, N.Y., will attend the University in the fall.

Claiborne, a 6'0 guard, averaged 14 points and 4 assists per game while Eldridge, a 6'2 guard, average 20 points and 7 assists a game as they led the Taft HS team to the Public School Athletic League Championship.

Claiborne was rewarded for her performance by being named to the All Division A team.

"Derick is an outstanding prospect" Leaman stated "and his present ability plus his desire to improve stamps him as a fine addition to the Massachusetts basketball program."

Eldridge was named All Division A and All N.Y. City, tieing for the second highest amount of votes received.

Coach Leaman stated "Alex Eldridge has the potential to be one of the outstanding college basketball players in the country. With his dedication to the game and plenty of hard work we expect Alex to make a valuable contribution to our basketball program next year."

Coach Leaman concluded, "We are proud and happy that these two fine young men have selected the University of Massachusetts to further their education."

Derick and Alex played for Coach Don Adams, one of the outstanding high school coaches in the East, who guided the 23-1 Taft team to national ranking as the 6th best high school basketball team in the country.

Mike Brophy

Funtime in Florida

Everything was beautiful in the Land of Sun for a group of 21 UMass students, a coach, and a trainer. All of them are looking like a transplanted tribe of American Indians this morning after enduring ten days in the Miami Beach area.

"Boy those ballplayers get the life though, don't they?" a lot of people had asked me as I remained in Amherst to relay the scores and other pertinent information to the papers up here in New England.

If I can recall correctly, the first words out of Coach Bergquist's mouth went something like this. "Hello, Mike?....The weather is BEAUTIFUL down here......We won but let's make this quick, I wanna go grab a swim in the ocean before it gets too dark..."

There wasn't a day of vacation that I didn't wish I had gone South with them. But there was much hard work mixed in with all the fun of beach life as the ball team put in nearly six or seven hours of pure baseball every day they were down in the city except for Sunday when they prepared to leave for the North.

Vic Keedy, who has been making the spring trip for the past fifteen or so years, said this one was the best overall trip he had been on in terms of playing, the weather, and everything else rolled into one.

The state is literally flooded with ballplayers from February until the start of April when the regular season opens up for most colleges and the major leagues. So when the Minutemen were not playing, they would have the opportunity to view some of the big leaguers getting ready for the long summer ahead.

Of course, some wise guy would rather be on the beach sipping a slow drink. But what can you do, right?

At any rate they are back safe and sound and ready to take on Boston College this coming Sunday in a game that starts at 1 p.m. "It sure won't be the same as playing in the 80 degree heat like we have been, but it beats the Cage," commented a player who dreads the thought of returning indoors to practice.

"We will take practice on a day to day basis here. If it's nice outside we'll go out. If not, well..." said Bergquist from his office as he sorted through the stacks of mail and found two pay checks waiting for him. He smiled as if to say "Ah, we can eat again."

"I was really pleased with the efforts our two freshmen pitchers put in for us as well as a guy like Chip Baye," said Bergquist. "Chip was throwing the best I've seen him do in three years for us and if he keeps that up...he'll definitely be a big help. John McManus, too, was a big surprise to me."

McManus told me before leaving for the South that he could do the job if just given the chance to prove himself. He came on strong to win a pair of ball games and has now made his impression on the head coach. A good one at that.

Steve Merrill. Who's he? It is a name that is easily overlooked as it is not found in the headlines like Flanagan or McMahon but it could arise to that this year as he looked very good when on the mound with good, low control.

So with the pitchers ready and anxious to get going, it's time for someone to make a definite move to get the starting position at second. Billy MacDonald, Jerry Mondalto, and Joe Marzilli are all out for the job and fighting hard.

It should be known by opening day.

Grad Senate budget set;
$18 fee triple 1974's

By BILL DENSMORE
MDC Staff

The graduate student senate last night finalized a fiscal 1975 budget which will result in a 1974-75 activities tax on graduate tuition bills of $18 — three times the annual fee this year.

The budget passage came as the undergraduate student senate considers a fiscal 1975 budget of less than the 1974 level in a move towards fiscal austerity.

At a meeting attended by eighteen out of sixty-four graduate department representatives, the senate approved a budget which includes a $15,000 appropriation for the Campus Transit Service, which operates the free bus system on and off campus.

In place of the two funding proposals involving the Collegian and WMUA, the grad reps approved a $7,500 budget appropriation for "campus communications" which could be used for a weekly graduate newsletter or funding of The Collegian and WMUA at a later date.

Senators approved a budget appropriation totaling $64,800 for fiscal 1975 which will result in 3,600 UMass-Amherst undergraduates paying $18 per year for student services and $9 per semester.

This spring and last fall, graduates paid $4 and $2 respectively on their semester bills for graduate senate activities. Last night's approval of the fiscal 1975 category appropriations carried on a voice vote.

In other action, the senators approved a ban on smoking in University classrooms at graduate senate meetings to eliminate what the sponsor termed a "health hazard." That motion also passed on a voice vote.

A motion to rescind an earlier reconsideration not to fund The Collegian $10,000 in fiscal 1975 was defeated 10-9, resulting in deletion of any formal funding for the newspaper. WMUA, which was funded for $5,000 at a pre-vacation senate meeting, had funding rescinded on a vote of 9-7.

Paul J. Hamel, undergraduate senate treasurer who pushed for funding The Collegian, said in a statement, the decision, "was based upon a polling of their constituency."

"It's hard to argue with people who state in good faith that they are upholding the views of their constituency, and their constituency does not want to fund The Collegian," he said.

'Sting' grabs most Oscars

LOS ANGELES (AP) - "The Sting," a tale of two con men trying to fleece a big-time racketeer in 1936 Chicago, won seven Oscars including best picture of 1973 at the 46th Academy Awards on Tuesday night.

Jack Lemmon, the guilt-ridden businessman driven to arson in "Save the Tiger," and Glenda Jackson, the acid-tongued divorcee on a European binge in "A Touch of Class," were named best actor and actress.

Other awards for Universal Studios' "The Sting" went to director George Roy Hill and writer David S. Ward.

Supporting acting awards went to Tatum O'Neal, the pint-sized confidence miss of "Paper Moon," and John Houseman, the Steal-minded law professor of "The Paper Chase."

Lemmon tearfully accepted the applause of the Music Center audience as he accepted his Oscar-in sharp contrast to last year's winner, Marlon Brando, who sent an Indian girl to turn down the award.

"There has been a great deal of criticism of this award in recent times," said Lemmon. "And perhaps some of it was justified. But I think it was one hell of an honor."

The Boston-born, Harvard-educated Lemmon become the first actor in the 46-year Oscar to win two categories in acting. He won in 1955 as best supporting actor in "Mr. Roberts."

A nude male streaker appeared as David Niven was announcing the best picture award. The streaker, who later identified himself as Robert Opel, a Hollywood advertising man, dashed across the stage behind Niven.

French Leader Dies

PARIS (AP) - Georges Pompidou, who in his first and only election campaign suceeded to the strong French presidency built by Charles de Gaulle, died yesterday of an undisclosed illness. He was 62.

Pompidou had been plagued by illness and there had been speculation about his possible resignation.

Pompidou

The brief announcement from the presidential palace said Pompidou died at 9 p.m.-4 p.m. EDT.

A few hours earlier, the president's office said Pompidou was canceling all appointments because of an unstated illness.

The cause of death was not immediately disclosed, but there had been reports of various ailments, including leukemia or some other form of cancer.

Pompidou became president of France on June 15, 1969, defeating Alain Poher, who had become acting president when De Gaulle resigned after the electorate failed to approve his proposals for government centralization and senate reform.

De Gaulle died Nov. 10, 1970.

Under the French constitution, Poher as president of the senate now takes over the government to organize presidential elections. They must be held in 20 to 50 days.

The palace announcement earlier yesterday of Pompidou's illness was the second revelation in two weeks that the president was too ill to carry out his duties. Medical sources said two weeks ago that his condition was complicated by hemorrhoids.

In some of his public appearances he has appeared tired and bloated.

Recently he traveled to the Soviet Union to confer with Communist party leader Leonid Brezhnez, but in the last few days he canceled a scheduled spring trip to Japan and put off a planned ttrip to Bonn to confer with the West German chancellor, Willy Brandt.

Pompidou returned Monday from weekend at his country house near Paris.

WMUA elections strictly 'no-contest'

By LAURA DUBOWSKI

New WMUA officers for the term beginning in May, were elected last night. In a station meeting held at the Campus Center, Jack Harper, Scott Bacherman, Gary McAuliffe, and John Gallagher were elected as Station Manager, Program Director, Chief Engineer, and Business Manager respectively. Harper, McAuliffe, and Gallagher were incumbents. Excitement was held to a minimum as all candidates ran unopposed.

Among other business discussed was the fact that, due to lack of funding, the station will be unable to move from its current location at Marston Hall to a larger and more convenient site.

Also mentioned at the meeting was the possibility of being forced to discontinue programming during the summer. Lack of funds from the Student Senate was cited as the cause, however other alternatives are being investigated.

No suspects, witnesses in Poverty Comm. theft

By BOB MAC KAY

Approximately $373 in admissions was stolen at the NRBQ-Clean Living concert held in the Student Union Ballroom late Monday night.

According to a UMass police spokesman, two men ran past the front admission desk and into the ballroom at 12:10 a.m. The concert man who was collecting money and distributing tickets left the desk and chased the pair into the ballroom, because they had not paid. At 12:16 a.m., he returned to the desk and found that the money bag containing some $373 was gone.

There are no suspects and no witnesses in the case. The man who had been at the front desk and who chased the pair was unable to provide a description of either one of them.

The event was sponsored by the Poverty Committee, an RSO group (490) which makes contributions to political groups. Theresa Carr, President of the Poverty Committee, told the Collegian that there was a good chance the Poverty Committee, which was getting 10 per cent of the admissions, was contributing its share to the United Farm Workers.

President Carr said that Clean Living and NRBQ were each receiving 45 per cent of the ticket revenues. She said that both groups had been contemplating giving their money to political groups, also. Ms. Carr said that there was no official security guarding the money because "I didn't feel that there was a need for it." Often, groups which have events in the S.U.B. do not employ security guards.

Psychic Sherman visits Mercury; reports back

By FRED NOBLES
MDC Staff

"Who of you think you have ESP in your lives?" asked Continuing Education Program Director Norman Vercoe. Out of an audience of 300, about 40 people raised their hands. But the audience had come prepared for the "evening with Harold Sherman" recently at Mahar auditorium. Many had pens and paper, one man carried a tape recorder and aimed the mike at the podium throughout Sherman's speech.

Following Mr. Vercoe's "Welcome to the new world of ESP," local psychic Claudette Kiely took the stage to praise Mr. Sherman's "monumental" contributions to the field of psychic research. "Mr. Sherman's books have changed the lives of thousands of men and women throughout the world," she said.

Ms. Kiely then introduced faith healer Floyd McAuslan who in turn introduced Sherman. "One of the country's top experts in ESP" is a small, white haired man in a grey suit; he got to the stage and placed a small pile of index cards on the podium. These he moved one by one to the right as his speech continued.

Mr. Sherman talked of his first experience with psychic phenomena. When he was 17 and living in Rapid City, Michigan he reached for a light switch one night but an "inner voice" told him, "Don't turn on the light." He didn't. A few minutes later he reached again for the light and again the voice warned him. Just then a linesman for the electric company knocked on his door, burst in and said, "Don't turn on the light." It seems a high voltage wire was down across the power lines to the Sherman house.

"This one experience led to a life time career," said Sherman. He then recounted several other experiences including his 1937 "mind-to-mind communication" with Sir Hubert Wilkins while Wilkins was 3,000 miles away in the Arctic. During the five months he "Communicated" with Wilkins, Sherman "saw in my mind's eye a number of scenes and images" which were "impressions of where Wilkins was going, what he was doing, how he was dressed." One day he had the impression of a toothache, on that same day Wilkins entered in his diary. "This day I had a severe toothache."

Sherman went on to describe some properties of ESP: "Thoughts travel faster than the speed of light...they are not limited by time or space." Everyone, according to Sherman, "exists in a vast sea of consciousness."

Thus preparing the audience he went on to say, "What I'm going to tell you now may sound incredible." He then recounted the recent "Astral projections" to Jupiter he and Ingo Swann performed. Noting that much of the information sent back from Pioneer 10 which will be used to verify the accuracy of the projections has not yet been released, Sherman did say that "a number of significant hits" had been scored.

Sherman read from some notes he took during his trip to Jupiter: "I seem to be reduced to a speck, a particle...able to see in all directions...there is a gaseous mass of brilliant colors...I can see ice crystals, they are shimmering."

Sherman then revealed that a similar experiment had been performed on March 11. He and Swann projected themselves to Mercury, their observations will be compared with information from the March 29 fly-by of the planet by Mariner 10.

Sherman read from his notes on Mercury: "There is a great heat...I do not feel this heat as coming from the sun...there is a jelly-like quivering of the surface...I seem to sense fantastic crystaline shapes of great rigidity."

Mr. Sherman invited the audience to participate in the Mercury experiment. He suggested that if they wish to project their minds to Mercury, they should "set aside a time, write down your impressions" and mail them to the ESP Foundation before the Mariner 10 data is released.

When asked after his speech whether it was possible for the mind to become detached from the body during astral projection and, presumably, be lost in space forever, Sherman reassured the audience that it was not. The mind, he said, is attached to the body by an "electro-magnetic umbilical cord" which is "invisible to the naked eye."

In answering questions, Mr. Sherman also said that he was "positive" that UFO' exist and that "without question" a person can train his mind to heal people that are far away.

Southwest committee plans Whist Tournament

By FRAN BROCK
SW SOCIAL AND CULTURAL COMMITTEE

The Southwest Social and Cultural Committee is planning a Whist Tournament for April 17. The entrance fee will be $1 per team of two. There will be prizes of $25 for first place, $15 for second place, $10 for third place, three fourth place prizes of $5, and five McDonald gift certificates for fifth place.

The tournament, to be held in the Hampden Student Union, is one of the many projects planned by the Committee. The projects are two-fold. First, the Committee is trying to raise money for a SW festival to be held at the end of the year. Second, the Committee is trying to develop a more relaxed and "fun" living environment for the students of SW.

Other proposedprojectsinclude a coffee house caberet, to be held bi-monthly in Hampden, using local talent for performances: a film series (possibly a Marlon Brando film festival), and arts and crafts displays, similar to those in the Campus Center concourse.

Alumni ears ring, student lips sip as big Phonothon begins

By BILL HALAINEN

The UMass Student Phonothon, a phone calling marathon aimed at soliciting funds from University alumni, got under way last night in the auditorium of Memorial Hall, located near the Chapel.

About 25 students from Cashin, Brown and MacNamara joined other student volunteers in spending the night dialing alumni throughout New England and scattered areas in the United States.

After a free dinner donated by the Alumni Association, the callers began dialing and raised $470 within the first half hour. By 8:00 the amount pledged had risen to $880, and at the end of the night the volunteers had solicited nearly $4,000.

The high point of the night came just after the $880 mark was reached, when chairperson Bobbie LaPorte dragged an ashcan full of Schlitz into the middle of the room.

The beer, which LaPorte termed "incentive", was part of the cache of 70 cases which the Alumni had purchased for the phonothon volunteers.

"If we go through 70 cases in the first two weeks, we'll get more," says LaPorte. "We just didn't want to put it all out on the first night."

The participants, for the most part, seemed to really enjoy the evening. After knocking off calls to Hawaii, Colorado, Washington, and elsewhere, volunteer Steve Sadler commented that making phone calls soliciting funds "was pretty easy and a lot of fun", though he admitted that he was nervous during the first few calls.

The Student Phonothon, according to coordinator Brenda Rau, is the first wholly student run phonothon in the nation, though mixed student-alumni attempts have been made elsewhere.

The phonothon will take place on 15 different nights between April 2 and April 28. About 400 students out of the 500-600 required have signed up to participate so far.

A number of campus groups will be taking part in the event. The fraternities have promised to send 60 people, and the Vets, Student Senate and Collegian will all be helping out over the next month.

The Student Phonothon is part of a larger fund-raising campaign run by the Associate Alumni. So far, there have been phonothons in Amherst, Springfield, Hartford, Boston, and Washington, D.C. The five phonothons have raised about $87,000 in pledges, which will go towards scholarships, support for the Library, and programs like Everywoman's Center and Outreach.

Rau hopes that the students will be able to raise at least $25,000, but adds that she realizes the difficulties involved.

"It's such a huge experiment that we can't even guess how much we'll actually raise," she says. "But, if nothing else, this'll at least inform students that we do have an active alumni organization on campus."

With the job market the way it is, graduating seniors and graduate students need all the help they can get in finding employment in their fields. If you're in this situation, or if you'd just like to check the prospects in some careers, the Career Counselling Library at the Career Counselling Center in Berkshire House may be just what you need.

The library is divided into three sections; General Careers, which includes catalogues and reference material on non-Education fields and summer jobs; Graduate Studies, with catalogues and information on graduate schools and graduate student professions; and a section for Education placement, including filing systems, catalogues and job openings.

Besides providing reference material, the library also provides placement and vacancy information. Job vacancies are sent to the library from various businesses and schools and these are posted for student or alumni use.

A new addition to the library is a computerized "Electro file." An information sheet is filled out by the student, and this is translated onto a coded "job preference sheet," according to Ms. Ozzi. This sheet is placed in the computer, and when job vacancies come in, they are matched against those in the computer, and if there is an applicant, he or she is notified by the Counselling Center.

Beginning this week, and running for thirteen weeks thereafter, says Ms. Ozzi, the library will have a computer service from the Department of Employment Security. The D.E.S. sends out micro-film copies of all job vacancies in the state, said Ms. Ozzi, and these would be received by the computer and made available to interested people. However, while the service is being provided at no cost by D.E.S., after thirteen weeks the Counselling Center will have to pay an operator to run the machine, and it is not known if there are sufficient funds available, Ms. Ozzi said.

While library is still expanding, there is a growing problem of manpower, according to Ms. Ozzi. "A Professional Librarian is needed" for organizing and running the library, said Ms. Ozzi. She feels there should also be a full time clerk-typist-filer.

Ms. Ozzi, who is assisted by Joanne Hadlock, says the library has seen "fairly good use" so far, and feels that it could act as the starting point for job hunters.

"It's not hard to find something useful" she said, "and if we don't have the exact information, we can usually refer you to some place that does."

Women conduct drive

The League of Women Voters will conduct a nationwide petition drive asking Congress to enact legislation to reform our system of financing political campaigns. The petitions will then be mailed to each state's senior senator.

In announcing the drive, which will run from April 8-22, Lucy Benson, League president, said, "We must break the link between big money and politics if we are to combat corruption, restore confidence in elected officials and ensure broad citizen participation in our political process."

The League's goal is a million and a half signatures-10 for each of its members. Other national organizations will join the petition drive to ensure that as many citizens as possible express their views to Congress.

The Federal Elections Campaign Act of 1974, reported almost unanimously from the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration in February, has strong bipartisan support. The bill provides for: a combined system of private and public financing for presidential and congressional primary and general elections. The income tax checkoff would be the principal source of public funds. A candidate could choose to use public funds only, private resources only, or a mix of the two. Limits on contributions from individuals and from the candidates themselves and on the overall amount of campaign spending. Federal matching money for candidates in primaries, once they showed public support by rasing a threshold amount in small contributions. Increased tax credits and deductions should provide greater incentives for small contributions. Tightening of reporting and disclosure of all financial transfactions, with stringent limits on the use of cash. An independent bipartisan Federal Elections Commission to monitor and enforce the law.

Senate party leaders, Mike Mansfield (D-Mt.) and Hugh Scott (R-Pa) have been in the forefront of the fight for reform and the 140 House members have cosponsored legislation similar to the Senate bill. John Gardner, chairman of Common Cause, plus prominent business and labor leaders like Henry Ford and George Meany strongly support this type of legislation.

Signatures on this petition will demonstrate to the Congress that the public wants changes in the campaign finance system NOW in time for the 1974 congressional elections and the 1976 presidential elections.

Interested in carrying a petition to get signatures? Call Grethchen Fanslow, 549-3919 or Eileen Dubois, 253-5688.

Donald Nixon denies involvement

NEW YORK (AP) — Donald Nixon testified yesterday that he rebuffed an effort by a Robert L. Vesco aide to get a message to his brother, President Nixon, but did suggest that "John Mitchell might be the man to talk to."

"I said there was no way I could do this," the tall, portly Nixon said. "It has been my policy ever since my brother has been in politics. I have never taken anything directly to him. For anyone I ever worked for.

"John Mitchell was the man designated — I never talked to my brother on any matter and John Mitchell was the man I was designated to talk. to," Nixon testified at another point.

President Nixon once said he had Donald Nixon's telephone tapped for security reasons — to protect his brother from people who might try to use him because of his relationship to the President.

Donald Nixon testified for the government at the criminal conspiracy trial of Mitchell, the onetime attorney general, and former Commerce Secretary Maurice H. Stans.

Nixon's testimony was in furtherance of the prosecution claim that Mitchell and Stans conspired with others in the obstruction of a Securities and Exchange Commission fraud investigation of Vesco in return for the international financier's secret $200,000 cash contribution to President Nixon's 1972 re-election campaign.

Donald Nixon's son, Donald Jr., 26, has worked for and traveled extensively with Vesco. But his father testified he didn't know whether the younger man still worked for Vesco.

Nixon was asked by Asst. United States Attorney James Rayhill about a conversation he had just prior to the 1972 presidential election with Howard Cerny, a legal aide to Vesco and a coconspirator in the Mitchell-Stans case. Under the law, a coconspirator is regarded as a member of a conspiracy, although not a defendant in its prosecution.

"Just prior to the election in 1972, Howard Cerny did call me," the 59-year-old Nixon testified.

"Specifically I don't recall the conversation. When he called me he said he wanted to see me about something important. The main thing he mentioned was that there had been a $200,000 contribution made to my brother's campaign and a Securities and Exchange Commission investigation was in progress and would very likely expose this contribution."

At this point, Nixon detailed his refusal to take the message to the White House, adding that the contribution had been described to him as made in cash.

'Deliberate lies' charged by Chapin prosecutor

WASHINGTON (AP) — There was a repetitious "pattern of deceit" in Dwight L. Chapin's testimony to the grand jury, a prosecutor said yesterday at the perjury trial of the man who once handled President Nixon's appointments.

"Mr. Chapin failed to tell the truth; Mr. Chapin told deliberate lies," assistant special Watergate prosecutor Richard J. Davis told the jury in his opening statement.

The 33-year-old Chapin, now a United Airlines marketing executive on leave, is charged in four counts of making false statements to the Watergate grand jury investigating the political dirty tricks of Donald H. Segretti.

Segretti, the prosecution's opening witness, told how he was recruited for his work by Chapin and White House aide Gordon Strachan, both friends from their days at the University of Southern California.

"As I see the evidence now, we don't foresee proving anyone is a liar," defense lawyer Jacob A. Stein said in his address to the jury of seven men and five women. "We will prove people have different recollections."

He said that in the September 1971-June 1972 period when Segretti was conducting his activities that Chapin was busy planning the President's trips to China and Russia and that Chapin himself made three journeys to China and two to the Soviet Union.

"Mr. Segretti was given a general roving commission to make trouble for the Democrats," Stein said in his 22-minute opening remarks. "Whether that was honorable or not is not the question. Segretti, whenever he did things, did them without prior clearance with Chapin. We think the evidence will show Segretti never told Chapin he ever personally distributed anything."

The charges against the dark-haired, handsome Chapin are that he lied under oath when he swore:

That he never discussed or knew Segretti had distributed statements or campaign literature; that when Segretti came to him for advice after the Watergate break-in threatened to close his activities, Chapin told him to talk to the FBI; that he never expressed any interest or gave instructions to target on any particular candidate; that he never knew how much Segretti was paid.

Segretti, a diminutive California lawyer, was released March 25 after serving four and a half months of a six-month sentence. He had pleaded guilty to three misdemeanor counts of violating campaign laws.

Laotian coalition government formed, includes Pathet Lao

VIENTIANE, Laos (AP) — Premier Prince Souvanna Phouma and the Communist-led Pathet Lao agreed yesterday to form a coalition government. It came 12 years after the last such regime in Laos callapsed in bitter fighting.

Pathet Lao secretary-general Phoumi Vongvichit announced the agreement following a 70-minute meeting with Souvanna Phouma. The two had been conferring almost daily since Phoumi arrived in Vientiane last Wednesday for the final negotiations on a coalition.

Phoumi said the Pathet Lao leader, Prince Souphanouvong, who is a half-brother of Souvanna Phouma, will arrive in Vientiane on Wednesday. The two princes were scheduled to travel together Thursday 200 miles to the north to the royal capital at Luang Prabang where their coalition government was to be ritually endorsed by the king.

Souphanouvong was reportedly to serve as one of two deputy premiers under Souvanna Phouma, just as he did in the last joint government.

The coalition will be the third for Laos since the country gained its freedom from France. The first, in 1957, lasted five months.

The second, formed in 1962 following the Geneva agreement on Laos, was also short-lived and collapsed in open fighting between Pathet Lao and neutralist forces after the assassination of leftist Foreign Minister Quinim Pholsena.

The new coalition was formed on the basis of the Laotian peace accord, which was signed in February 1973. Under a further agreement signed last September, the Vientiane government of Souvanna Phouma will have three major cabinet posts — defense, finance and interior — while the Pathet Lao will take foreign affairs. The Pathet Lao will also appoint the head of the Joint National Political Council which will recommend policy to the cabinet.

In neighboring Cambodia, Premier Long Boret announced formation of a new four-man high executive council that will advise President Lon Nol and make "more efficient" the government's making of decisions.

Saxbe sees kidnappings following textbook plans

WASHINGTON (AP) — Atty. Gen. William B. Saxbe suggested yesterday that Patricia Hearst's kidnapers followed instructions from a textbook written by some other terrorist organization.

In an interview, Saxbe said the existence of such a manual suggests the involvement of "a world-wide conspiracy" in the rash of kidnappings in the United States and other countries since Miss Hearst was abducted two months ago.

A group calling itself the Symbionese Liberation Army has claimed responsibility for kidnaping the 20-year-old California newspaper heiress.

"When you think the Symbionese and the others are talking this right out of some Maoist doctrinal textbooks on how to operate in terrorism and other forms of civil disturbance, you realize it is not just a coincidental thing," Saxbe said.

Asked if he was suggesting the existence of a conspiracy, he replied, "a world-wide conspiracy."

Saxbe said he had evidence that such a conspiracy exists but said he could not discuss it further.

Asked to name the distributors of the kidnap manuals, he replied, "there are Maoist organizations that have done this. We have no shortage of terrorist organizations."

FBI spokesman Robert Franck said authorities have come across about three guerrilla manuals circulated among militant groups in recent years.

One of the newest, is a volume called "Organizing Urban Guerrilla Units" written by Raul Estremera and circulated in units of the Black Liberation Army, an offshoot of the Black Panther Party, Franck said.

He said that the manual discusses kidnaping and recommends food distribution to the poor as a ransom demand. The Symbionese Liberation army demanded that the Hearst family provide millions of dollars worth of free food for California's poor.

But Franck said he himself has no information about whether any of the guerrilla manuals might have been employed by the Hearst kidnapers.

Saxbe said there is a "tremendous risk" that government officials may be abducted.

"This is all a part of the scheme of some of the irresponsible terrorist organizations," he said.

Cox on prosecutor

WASHINGTON (AP) — Former special Watergate prosecutor Archibald Cox testified yesterday against establishing a special prosecutor's office on a permanent basis to investigate wrongdoing by high government officials.

"The primary responsibility for preventing wrongdoing high in the executive branch, for exposing it promptly, and for dealing with the wrongdoers rests with the President," Cox told a Senate Judiciary subcommittee.

"No president should be relieved of it, or of the consequences of default," he added.

The subcommittee is considering a bill by chairman Sam J. Ervin Jr., D-N.C., to make the Justice Department an independent agency and another by Sen. Alan Cranston, D-Calif., looking toward the establishment of a permanent special prosecutor.

Cox also said that the creation of a permanent independent prosecutor also was not free from constitutional doubt.

Captured observers

DAMASCUS, Syria (AP) — Two United Nations observers, an American and an Irishman, were forced to march 20 miles barefoot wearing only their underwear to a Syrian military outpost, they said yesterday.

Syrian authorities said the observers had been mistaken for Israelis, and that the two men were expected to be released from a Damascus hospital soon.

Capt. John J. Holly, 27, a United States Marine from Corning, N.Y., and Capt. James Mortell of Ireland appeared in good spirits.

"We are soldiers and as such have to accept things like this as an occupational hazard," Holly said in an interview. "I would not be a soldier unless I knew that anything could happen."

The U.N. observer force is stationed between Israeli and Syrian troops along the 40-mile cease-fire line in the Golan Heights. The two armies have been fighting every day for the past three weeks with tanks and artillery.

Agnew disbarment

ANNAPOLIS, Md. (AP) — Attorneys for Spiro T. Agnew told the Maryland Court of Appeals yesterday that the former vice president's high position and "public outcry" should not affect a decision on whether Agnew should be disbarred.

The attorneys said Agnew, who resigned the vice presidency and pleaded no contest last year to evading about $13,500 in federal taxes in 1967 when he was governor of Maryland, should only be suspended from practicing law and not disbarred.

Agnew is appealing a unanimous recommendation of a three-judge Circuit Court panel that he be disbarred.

Hearst release to be revealed by SLA within three days

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — An underground newspaper said yesterday it had received half of Patricia Hearst's driver's license and a message purporting to be from her terrorist kidnapers saying the exact place and time of her release would be revealed in 72 hours.

The communique was brought to the biweekly Phoenix by a local florist. It was wrapped in a dozen longstemmed roses.

It concluded: "Further communications regarding subject prisoner will follow in the following 72 hours, communications will state the state, city and time of release of the prisoner."

The communique demanded that the "Codes of War" of the Symbionese Liberation Army, which were enclosed, be printed by the news media.

The communique was addressed to Phoenix editor John Bryan and was signed, "I.I. Unit 4, Gen. Field Marshal Cin. SLA."

The SLA has claimed responsibility for kidnaping the 20-year-old newspaper heiress Feb. 4. It has previously referred to Miss Hearst as a "prisoner of war" and some previous communications have carried the signature of Gen. Field Marshall Cin, or General Field Marshall Cinque.

The driver's license enclosed in the communique was cut diagonally in half. Part of Miss Hearst's signature and part of her photograph were visible. A Hearst family spokesman said he had been told by the Phoenix that the underground newspaper's attorney had confirmed the authenticity of the driver's license.

Earlier yesterday, the Hearst Corp. said its $4-million offer of free food for the poor will be withdrawn if Miss Hearst is not released within one month. The corporation said it had placed the money in escrow Tuesday, and that it would be released for a food giveaway if Miss Hearst were released unharmed before May 3.

"This is not a threat, simply a term of the escrow," said Randolph A. Hearst, the girl's father. "We could have made it 60 days, but we want our daughter back sooner. This gives the SLA 30 days to make up its mind. All they have to say is yes or no."

The kidnapers said in the communique that they had sent the latest communication to the Phoenix with the understanding "that you must not cooperate with the FBI by turning over this communication or by providing them with any information."

Charles Bates, FBI agent in charge of the case, said, "We don't know anything about it. We have heard nothing...."

Bryand said the flowers were delivered by Crete Florists in downtown San Francisco. He said he telephoned the florist who informed him a white woman with brown hair had placed the order on Monday for delivery Tuesday. The communique purporting to be from the SLA was dated March 29, which was last Friday.

Nixon invited to campaign in Michigan special election

DETROIT (AP) — The possibility of a campaign visit by President Nixon has become an issue in a special congressional race in a traditionally Republican Michigan district.

"Whether or not Nixon is coming, one thing is clear," said State Rep. J. Robert Traxler, the Democratic candidate. "We know that Nixon is the real Republican candidate. We know what the real issues are."

The election was called to fill the seat vacated by Republican James Harvey, who was appointed to a federal judgeship. It is the fifth of six special congressional elections this year. Democrats have won three of the preceding four, including the Michigan race to fill the seat held by Vice President Gerald R. Ford.

Nixon was invited to the district to campaign by the Republican candidate, James Sparling, a former Harvey aide who has said that as a congressman he would vote for impeachment if there is any proof of wrongdoing by Nixon.

The White House said Monday that Nixon would seriously consider the invitation. Senate Republican Whip Robert Griffin of Michigan said yesterday in Washington that the President still hasn't decided whether to visit Michigan. He said, however, that the April 16 election "should not be turned into a referendum on President Nixon."

An aide to Sparling said yesterday that the question of a presidential visit is "strictly up to the White House now. We haven't heard a thing."

Simon expects prices to rise "a few cents" across nation

BOSTON (AP) — Federal energy chief William Simon said yesterday that the price of gasoline will go up "a few cents" a gallon when new Arab oil reaches the United States.

However, Simon told newsmen that the price increase will not be spread evenly among all service stations and said prices may go above 70 cents per gallon in some instances.

The national average gasoline price is about 51 cents per gallon, but that is before new petroleum freed by the end of the Arab oil embargo gets into circulation in this country, Simon said.

"There will be a few pennies increase in the national average," Simon said, "but the impact will vary. You will not see anywhere near a national average of 70 cent a gallon."

But it might reach that level at stations that depend primarily on imported oil, he said.

"What in the world can we do about it if all of your needs are met by imports. There are going to be isolated cases of gasoline at these prices, but you are going to find stations that depend on domestic supplies with prices far below that."

This summer, Simon said, "We will have an adequate supply of gasoline, assuming continuation of conservation. for people to take vacations."

Simon has been mentioned as a possible successor to George Schultz as secretary of the treasury but he declined to speculate on whether or not he would get the job.

He said he has not been approached by anyone from the White House about taking the job.

Simon, who also holds the position of deputy treasury secretary, said "I really haven't had time to think about other positions that might or might not befall me."

A White House spokesman said earlier that a new treasury secretary would be named this week.

In a luncheon speech, Simon said a report by the federal Council on Environmental Quality says oil drilling off the Atlantic Coast is possible.

"While the report has not been made public yet, their preliminary conclusions are that as long as all the necessary precautions are taken to protect the environment, drilling could be unnertaken in the Atlantic," Simon said.

Simon spoke at the annual meeting of the New England indpependent home heating oil dealers. He said that the federal government will try to speed up leasing of the outer continental shelf for oil exploration.

The energy crisis

Coal burning denial urged for Western Mass Electric

BOSTON (AP) — The regional administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency will recommend that the EPA deny a variance for burning coal by the Western Massachusetts Electric Co. in West Springfield, it was learned yesterday.

An aide to Gov. Francis W. Sargent also said that it appears no other utilities in Massachusetts will be granted variances to burn coal instead of oil as a result of the energy crisis. The Sargent aide, John Drew, said Public Health Commissioner William J. Bickness has received a letter from EPA Regional Administrator John McGlennon saying that McGlennon will recommend to the EPA that the variance for Western Massachusetts Electric will be denied.

The variance had been approved by the state Public Health Department Jan. 16. Meanwhile, Sargent wrote a letter to Rep. Silvio O. Conte, R-Mass., saying that "Federal energy efforts certainly seem contradictory.

"The Federal Energy Office has encouraged the state to allow coal burning. But the states are stalled by the actions of the Environmental Protection Agency and are bound by a Clean Air Act which takes no account of the need to provide adequate power at reasonable prices..."

Has the energy crisis left an imprint on American life? Part one: The cities

By JOSH FITZHUGH
Associated Press Writer

The energy crisis will not save the cities, but it may give them time to save themselves.

Pre-existing trends toward inner city living and mass transit may be accelerated, while some movement out of the cities may be slowed.

After all, says the head of Philadelphia's planning commission, "the cities are really the best energy savers that man has ever devised."

Long-range trends are difficult, if not impossible, to gauge. Officials universally say "it's too early to tell" whether lifestyle changes in the cities caused by the winter energy shortage will last.

"Energy will be a new factor in the complicated equation of where people live and work," says Doug Parker, newly appointed energy adviser for the United States Department of Housing and Urban Development.

The Associated Press surveyed leaders and citizens in several of the country's largest cities to see what changes the energy crisis has brought.

Their answers indicate that:

—For the moment the flight from the cities may have stopped. Families and businesses appear more cautious about leaving. Young couples see an added advantage in attached row houses.

Most important, those who love the cities, or are committed to them, feel the energy crisis provides a new psychological weapon to combat the fear of racial distrust and urban crime.

"I think there's been something in the nature of an awakening that things can't go on the way they were," says Donald Moore, president of the Downtown Brooklyn Development Association. "Everything at least psychologically is flowing in our direction."

To Susan Keller, urban sociologist at Princeton University, it's a question whether "the fantasy of open space and the open road or the fantasy of the rich city predominates.

"I have heard people saying they'll take another look at the cities, that maybe cities are in again," she says. Still there appears a need "to combine various modes of life with new kinds of transport," she says.

As gasoline dwindled this winter, mass transit ridership increased between 5 and 10 per cent in some cities. Transit authorities added bus lines and special lanes for car pools and urged businesses to stagger working hours to alleviate bunching. Ridership in Honolulu was so heavy officials feared the congestion would drive passengers away once the gasoline crunch eased.

In Los Angeles traffic on the fabled freeways dropped as much as 33 per cent, with accidents off sharply. Downtown parking fell 20 to 45 per cent. The city's engineer, S.S. Taylor, bought his first bicycle to see what problems confronted the two-wheelers.

"I was thinking of getting a foreign car, a small one," said Boston cab driver Ken McCarthy. "But now I'll get a bicycle if anything. I'm serious."

Perhaps to aid the shift, Boston increased its parking meter fees fivefold.

"People may travel to and from work in a different way to have enough money and fuel to move about more freely during non-working hours," says David Grayson of the Automobile Club of Southern California.

Confined to the city, persons looked to restaurants, theaters and museums for entertainment. Some rediscovered neighborhood parks — or neighbors. Says Richard Barr of the League of New York Theaters: "God knows we're not encouraging the energy crisis, but it's given a lot of people a chance to find out that New York is not quite the jungle it is supposed to be."

So far planners detect some increased interest in the downtown areas. Builders are looking more closely at housing in downtown Detroit. Demand is up in central Los Angeles.

"I hear a lot of talk about people moving back downtown because of the energy crisis," says Tom Puett, president of an Atlanta development company. "The real estate appraisers that used to look at our neighborhood with a good bit of skepticism are now very optimistic about it.

"I can't tell you that everybody in the suburbs is going to move downtown, but the appraisers' attitude is a good sign."

Calvin Hamilton, director of Los Angeles city planning, feels fuel prices are bound to spur the re-use of the city's tremendous investment in sewers, schools, parks and streets. "People may want to stay in and rebuild the house they have," he says.

"Anytime the decision to leave is put off, it's got to be a help," says Richard Seeler, a corporate real estate broker in New York. The energy crisis has made businesses "stop and think" about leaving for suburban locations, he says.

Divorce ruling

BOSTON (AP) — The state law that makes new residents in Massachusetts wait two years before they are eligible to file for divorce is unconstitutional, the state Supreme Court ruled yesterday.

In a 4-3 decision, the court ruled that the two-year residence requirement "penalizes persons merely because they have recently traveled interstate." The dissenting judges said the decision will "open the door to possible fraud and abuses."

In an 18-page dissent, Justice Paul C. Reardon argued that when people want a divorce it is of "such paramount importance" that they will manufacture a place of residence.

"No other sector of the judicial process has been so fraught with sham and deception as that dispensing divorce," he wrote.

The ruling was made in the cases of two Dorchester couples.

The majority decision said the removal of the two-year residence limitation would not make Massachusetts an appealing jurisdiction for "migratory divorce seekers."

Revenue sharing

BOSTON (AP) — A state senator has proposed creation of a $50 million state revenue sharing program.

Under Sen. John H. Fitzpatrick's bill, four per cent of state revenues would go into a special revenue sharing account for redistribution back to communities.

The Stockbridge Republican said Massachusetts is near the bottom of the list in amount of aid to local governments coming from the state. The program would ease local reliance on the property tax as a means of raising revenue, he said.

uvm court suit

BURLINGTON, Vt. (AP) — A $175,000 damage suit against the University of Vermont has been settled out of court. The suit was brought by Michael Parenti, formerly an assistant professor of political science.

UVM Trustee Luther Hackett said Monday that the cause had been settled out of court.

The attorney for the university trustees, Douglas Pierson, said the court case had ended. He said, however, that all parties had decided to keep the settlement amount private.

Hackett said the state university will not have to pay any of the settlement because the U.S. District Court had ruled earlier that if it found in favor of Parenti, the university's insurance company would be liable for the damages.

Parenti brought the suit after he was not rehired by the university trustees in December 1971. Parenti claimed he had not been retained for political reasons.

Turners Falls girl

TURNERS FALLS (AP) — The body of Linda Ann Wickline, 7, of Turners Falls, missing since Saturday, was recovered yesterday from an industrial canal here.

The girls's body was discovered in more than 10 feet of water by Metropolitan District Commission divers brought in to aid in the search.

The girl and her brother, Christian, 4, died when a van in which they were sitting rolled down a hill, broke through a fence and fell into the canal. The boy's body was recovered Saturday.

A partial shutdown in operations occurred Monday at two paper mills and a utility company pumping station as searchers lowered the water level of the canal in an effort to locate the girl's body.

Officials said the body was recovered about 30 yards from the spot where the van was recovered.

Milton Bradley plan

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — The City Council has granted the Milton Bradley Co. 60 days to conduct a feasibility study of federal square.

The council unanimously agreed to allow the study Monday night after chamber of commerce officials said the game manufacturer, which is interested in the square for expansion, was its prime industrial candidate for the land.

The city decided in October to give the chamber six months to come up with an industrial client before proceeding with plans to build a new technical high school in Federal Square.

Refinery supported by Simon on visit

BOSTON (AP) — Federal energy chief William Simon urged yesterday that New England do all it can to locate an oil refinery in the region.

Simon also encouraged oil drilling on the Atlantic outer continental shelf.

"Here in New England, where consumption exceeds one million barrels a day, there isn't a single refinery operating in the entire six-state area," Simon said.

"For your sake, as well as for the nation's, this region must do all it can to encourage new refining capacity — capacity keyed to the product needs of the region, capacity built in a responsible way with the greatest possible economic development," he said.

Simon commented at the annual meeting of the New England Fuel Institute, an association of independent of home heating oil dealers. The oilmen gave him two standing ovations.

Simon said the federal Council on Environmental Quality has finished an environmental study of leasing oil drilling rights off the East Coast.

"While the report has not been made public yet, their preliminary conclusions are that as long as all the necessary precautions are taken to protect the environment, drilling could be undertaken in the Atlantic," he said.

Simon said he found it incredible that only three per cent of the outer continental shelf has been leased for drilling. None of that is in the Atlantic.

The time has come to wed our technology and our environmental concerns with the challenge of the largest remaining untapped petroleum resource available to the United States," he said.

At a news conference before the speech, Simon predicted that the price of gasoline will go up a few cents and in some cases might exceed 70 cents a gallon.

The national average price of gasoline is now about 51 cents a gallon, Simon said. "There will be a few pennies increase in the national average" when higher priced oil freed from the Arab oil embargo reaches the United States.

"The impact will vary," he said. "You will not see anywhere near a national average of 70 cents a gallon.

"What in the world can we do about it if all of your needs are met by imports. There are going to be isolated cases of gasoline at these prices, but you are going to find stations that depend on domestic supplies with prices far below that."

There's no easy way for Charlie Nelson to become Dr. Nelson.

But there is a way to make it somewhat easier. Our way. The Armed Forces Health Professions Scholarship Program. It won't soften the demands of your professors, or those you make upon yourself —but it may free you from those financial problems which, understandably, can put a crimp in your concentration.

If you qualify, our scholarship program will cover the costs of your medical education. More, you'll receive a good monthly allowance all through your schooling.

But what happens after you graduate?

Then, as a health care officer in the military branch of your choice you enter a professional environment that is challenging, stimulating and satisfying.

An environment which keeps you in contact with practically all medical specialties. Which gives you the time to observe and learn before you decide on your specialty. Which may present the opportunity to train in that specialty. And to practice it.

You may also find some of the most advanced medical achievements happening right where you work. Like at the Brooke Army Medical Center in San Antonio, Texas, long noted for its Burn Treatment Center. Or the home of Flight Medicine, the famed Aerospace Medical Division, also in San Antonio. Or the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Maryland, recognized worldwide for its work in Medical Research.

And if you've read this far, you may be interested in the details. Just send in the coupon and we'll supply them.

A whole page of letters to the editor

Do we own it or not?

To The Editor:

This letter is to protest crass and cavalier handling of students by the Student Union Governing Board.

We designed an emblem bearing the words "National Steaking Association" several weeks ago and made a silkscreen stencil of it. We then printed up a number of T-shirts on a press which we made ourselves, with the intention of selling the shirts in the Campus Center Concourse.

When signing up for a table, I (Kris) was told that we needed permission of the campus store, because they also sell t-shirts. The manager of store refused permission. Since I was told simply that we could not sell on the concourse we thought they were just trying to remove us from the vicinity of the store and so we sold our shirts in the hall outside the Hatch. We started on Tuesday, March 12, and on Wednesday a manager informed us that we were still in violation of the rules and had to pack up. Denny asked who we could speak to and was told to see Mike Curran of the SUG board, or a Mr. Wilkes. Curran was not available, but Mr. Wilkes was, and he gave us a waiver so that we could finish out the day.

In the process of getting the waiver, Denny found out that the price of reserving a table is now $5.00 per half day, as opposed to the dollar a day of a year ago. Furthermore, she asked the store manager how he could justify kicking us out when a largescale commercial outfit, Toadstools, is allowed to take over the Colonial Lounge twice a semester to sell machine-embroidered shirts and "persian" rugs and tapestries. She was told that they rent the space, at four hundred dollar a day! In other words, policy evaporates for a price.

Furthermore, we are not asking for a change in policy. We fit into category No. 2 of the policy sheet we were given, and that is: full fee-paying student artisans selling wares made by our own hands.

But the manager told us since we did not make the shirt ourselves, we had no right to sell it. When told we are no different from the leathercrafters who make their own designs on ready-made belts and buckles, he told us that the leather crafters tan their leather! He also told us that his decision was appealable to a meeting of the SUG board, and appeal we tried.

We found that the board was meeting on Thursday morning March 21, the day we write this letter. We showed up for the meeting this morning, only to find that the date had been changed to yesterday, without notice!

We have had to resort to hawking our wares in the manner of dealers of illicit drugs, because our initial success has been effectively cancelled out by the greed of those tweedsuited bureaucrats, and we're going financially in the hole.

If the University Store were operating off campus, they'd have no recourse in combatting our "competition" except to search around for nicer, cheaper shirts. Here, they have a monopoly and intend to keep it that way.

Most Sincerely and Angrily yours,
Kris Jackson and Denny Matteau

Get involved

To The Editor:

The words flying around this place, words like "racism" and "conspiracy" can be incredibly confusing and incredibly absurd sometimes. What is a conspiracy? It's defined as "an agreement between (people) to commit a crime; a plot."

There's no conspiracy among the various media to be racist. It just so happens that they are racist, and it's all unplanned. Unfortunately, as the culture goes, it's damned easy to be racist without ever intending to be. It takes conscious planning to avoid and fight racism, and having worked with both the Collegian and WMUA, I can say there's apparently a phobia of conscious planning within both organizations. I can't put my finger on the precise reason for this, but the radio blames their wishy-washyness on the threat of FCC action, and the newspaper is afraid of violating the "rights of free speech".

Part of me wants to champion the cause of insulted blacks who would like to change the atmosphere promoted by lack of action, but part of me gets fed up. I'm a white woman, and I have my own cause to champion. No one else is doing it for me.

What I'm getting at is, as long as the paper is white, it's going to be racist. Bill Foster is the only black face I see around here. I used to see Phil Curry here, but haven't lately. I respect the need for autonomy in the black community, and the need for defense against being co-opted by pseudo-liberals. But I see a lot of angry rhetoric being thrown at the Collegian, and the Collegian deserves most of it, but rhetoric is only step one. Action, physical energetic involvement is step two. The Collegian staff isn't going to take up wearing burnt cork.

Most of the staffers seem afraid to find out what racism and sexism are. I once complained to someone that he exhibited sexism in his overall view of women more than in any specific instance, because while I don't think the depiction of a sexy woman in itself is sexist, I think the constant neglect of depicting women in any other light is. And the fella said to me that he didn't see women except in bed. Well, what am I? What are Karen and Joan and Barbara and Sue and Cindy and Sharon and Pamela and half the people in most classes? That's the kind of ignorance one runs into. There's also the person who told me I had no right to denounce McGilvray as I did, unless I also denounced Kris Jackson for "making fun of hippies".

This attitude is part of the entire white community, not just the Collegian. As a freshman I attended a "white on white" sensitivity group on the subject of racism. It was led by a guiltridden white man from South Africa. I owe a lot to that group. In it, I discovered that this man could illustrate racism by saying that the statement "Blacks can contribute to society in their own way" is patronizingly racist, while the same sentence with "women" substituted for "blacks" is benign, unharmful.

I owe my sudden crystalization of lifelong resentments to that session. And when I expressed it, only one man in the group of fifteen or so recognized the problem: racism is one type of a deep and single process of oppression. Even the other woman in the group, a friend of mine, criticized me for being "extreme"; she did not feel oppressed.

The group failed to produce anything significant, that I could see, in the battle against racism, because it was isolated, and because most of the participants were basically there to try to exonerate themselves from the responsibility for oppression. If racism was an internal psychological problem, it could be solved in white sensitivity groups, but it is a social problem between different segments of the population and can only be solved in social struggle.

If the black community chooses a separatist path, and that's certainly a respectable choice, then they must forget changing the Collegian. If they choose an intergrationist path, then we must be integrated by whatever means necessary. Right now the paths seem confused.

Society makes racism

To The Editor:

The racist and sexist theorizing which this government supports, the universities cloak with respectability and the public school system spreads far and wide, forces us to fight among ourselves and disarms us politically by dividing us into categories of ethnic and sex.

American society has manipulated white males from birth into viewing non-white men and women (regardless of race) as inferior or less than human. This government currently funds sexist and racist research projects aimed as "proving" the LIE that one race, sex or class is inferior to another.

Sexism forces an inferior status upon women, exploits their bodies for sex and profit, channels women into unfulfilling, lower paying jobs which are servile in nature and purpose, and degrades and dehumanizes them by a double standard of morality wholly dependent on the MYTH of male supremacy.

Racism, pushes Third World men through inferior schools to inferior jobs to combat arms. Thus, Third World men are sent off to die in disproportionately high numbers, while forced to indiscriminately consume the lives of other Third World peoples. This does not conclude that poor working class white men are not subjected to this 'sequence' of oppression. But the dis-proportion of deaths of Third World men remain.

As white men, we must resolve to fight racism and sexism within our society, within this university community and within ourselves.

We must demand that the Collegian address itself to these issues, daily. Not as token noteworthy items, but as a communique responsible to the people of the university community, serving to expose the oppressive policies of this UNIVERSITY and this GOVERNMENT.

Zayre's—very rude

To The Editor:

On the afternoon of March 27 I was accosted at Zayre's in a manner which could be called anything but subtle. By whom? An employee - probably customer, watching in the ladies room on her lunch break. It could have been anybody.

The story? — I ambled out of the stall and nonchalantly discarded an old, tattered stationery box into the trash. Within 5-10 seconds the haze of pink jacket lurking in the corner became a speaking reality - the essence extremely distasteful - "May I see what you threw in there?" translated - I have nothing better to do but to harrass you at this moment. She proceeded to pull the trash out of the can, saw what it was and dissappointedly turned away. I could only look at her in disbelief as I made my exit.

By the time I reached the door I was seething. I not only felt angry and humiliated but worse yet, in this world - powerless!!!

The Point? Students are treated with a total lack of respect - to put it mildly - by people stores, shops, offices, by administrators, by professors and by students. The list is inexhaustible because the real problem is that in day to day life people treat each other in the most degrading, horrifying ways imaginable. It becomes a viscious contest - who can defile another human being's worth the best. We keep heaping points into a massive pile of putrid, reeking decay.

This is just one example. I find it completely irritating because it is a waste of time and energy.

Debaters need love

To The Editor:

On the front page of the Collegian March 18, 1974 there appeared two pictures—one was of Jack Leaman after the NIT defeat and the other of one of the members of the women's gymnastic team after their victory at the Eastern Championships. Granted this is good publicity for the University, but on that same weekend at West Point, something was going on that I think deserved a little bit of notice in the paper also. Two members of the UMass Debate Team qualified in the district tournament for the National Debate Tournament to be held in Colorado Springs next month. This is the second year in a row that a team from UMass has qualified, and we are fast gaining a reputation as one of the country's best teams. Surely that is as much of an accomplishment and deserves as much recognition as a defeat at the NIT, or maybe even the Eastern Gymnastic Championships. For those of you who don't know what such a success for the Debate Team and the University means—out of about one thousand programs in the country who send a team to each district tournament, only sixty qualify for the National Tournament. We wish to thank the Collegian for the few pictures and articles they have published about us over the course of the year, but wonder why they neglected to report anything of our most notable success. Since this is an academic institution, I think some attention ought to be paid to the academic endeavors of the people who are students here. After all, there is more to college than the basketball and gymnastic teams.

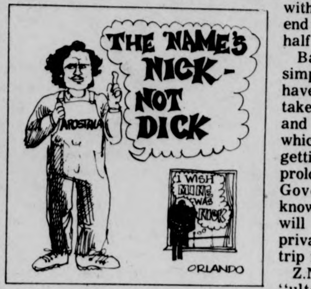
Take two aspirin

With all the ballyhoo that we've been subjected to, of late, regarding the resignation and-or impeachment of that Rock of Gibraltar president of ours, Richard Nixon, it has no doubt started to affect our consciousness. The word impeachment sounds magical and mystical to we who have for so long groveled at the bottom of the heap. We merely have to cry out "Impeachment! IIMMPPEEEAACCHHMMEENNTTT!!!" to send fear pulsating thru the veins of our Highest Electoral Officers and conjure images of Leavenworth in their subconscious. AH! It is a potent weapon, as it was meant to be by the framers of our Constitution. But thru the years it has fallen on disuse. With all of the frenzy now centering on Washington, deserved as it might be, there are those who have caught the contagion and have Impeachment Fever, a terminal illness no doubt. These are the people who wake up in the middle of the night in a sweat, and cry out "Impeach the bastard!!!" These are the people who in the course of a day initiate impeachment proceedings against two Dining Commons ladies, a physics T.A., a Bluewall bouncer, a Classics teacher, two German Shepards and a Hoover vacuum cleaner, for hassling them. These are the people who, when they get on an elevator in the library, have not only an Impeachment motion filled out and filed, but 200 signatures on it against that elevator for non-functioning, before it spits them out on the 29th floor. Then there are those who look at Impeachment with their narrow shifty little eyes and scheme on impeaching their friends and associates, so that they can move in on the spoils.



THE NAME'S NICK - NOT DICK
APOSTOLA
I WISH MINE WAS NICK
ORLANDO

There are people from both of these groups on campus who are trying to initiate the Impeachment of Nick Apostola with only two and a half weeks left in his term. I recently had a talk with a fellow UMie of mine who is among this desperate crew. His name is Harrisburg V. Backstabber and he is a Junior majoring in propaganda and deceit.

Z.N.: "How're ya doin there Harry?"

Backstabber: "Did I hear someone yell "Impeach"! Oh, Uh. No. I guess I didn't. Oh Uh! I'm fine, boy I can't wait for tonight.!"

Z.N.: "I'll bet I know whats on your mind! Its Impeachment! Huh?"

Backstabber: "Yeah! Hey!! Ya hit that right off! Yep tonights the big night. We'll impeach the S.G.A. President!"

Z.N.: "Who are these people, besides you that are pushing for Nick's Impeachment?"

Backstabber: "Well they're only six of us. But we're proud of our name anyway. We're the ASSHOLES TO IMPEACH NICK TONIGHT, good ole AINT. Some members are Tim O'Brien, Larry St. Cyr and Cindy McGrath who are all Hotshits in the Area Governments, which impresses me alot gosh darn it all, if it don't impress you."

Z.N.: "No they don't impress me to be truthful. Anyways, what can they possibly hope to accomplish with this Impeachment with the end of Nick's term only two and a half weeks away?"

Backstabber: "You see its simple. The Area Governments have organized a Conspiracy to take power away from the Senate and return it to the boondocks, which they of course control. By getting more power, it will just prolong the existence of the Area Governments which everybody knows are pretty well useless, and will let them have their own private arenas to politick and ego-trip in."

Z.N.: "Are there any other "ulterior motives" behind the ASSHOLES.

Backstabber: "Well there are. Some of those in AINT have a political future, they think, especially in the upcoming elections. By getting behind something like this they get intensive publicity in the media. With a couple of weeks before elections, its the perfect time for such a move."

A.N.: "Isn't it pretty obvious though?"

Backstabber: "Yes, its pretty obvious. But we're depending on a strong Anti-Rumanian vote to turn the tide! Petty Politics is what made this nation great!"

Z.N.: "What are you going to do after the Meeting tonight?"

Backstabber: "We're all gonna go on an Impeachment Streak thru the Bluewall."

Z.N.: "I can't think of a better way to expose you "ASSHOLES" to the world."

Backstabber: "I can't either."

OH! THE PAIN OF IT ALL!!!!

The "bussing bill"

The question of bussing in the Boston public schools came to a head this week when the State Board of Education issued its plan to racially balance the city's schools. There will be some bussing involved, although the Boston Globe contends that most students will still be able to walk to school. The balancing of the Boston Schools has been required by the Racial Imbalance Act of 1965. Yet even after years of debate there is considerable confusion over the plan to be used next September.

The 1965 law states that "racial imbalance shall be deemed to exist when the per cent of non-white students in any public school is in excess of fifty per cent of the total number of students in such school."

The Act further requires that when this situation exists the local school committee shall work with the State Board of Education to solve the problem. The City of Boston and the Board have been working on it for quite some time. Springfield also has racially imbalanced schools and has had to deal with the State Board. The State has the power to deny certain funds to both school systems if they fail to show progress in eliminating racial imbalance.

You may have noticed that the definition of racial imbalance favors the suburbs. Certainly Longmeadow, Newton or Dover are not going to have to worry about changing the student composition of their schools. Yet a school system that is 99.9 per cent white is not racially balanced.

A study of the voting patterns of rural and suburban legislators reveals that during the vote on the Bill rural and suburban legislators gave almost twice as much support to that legislation as urban representatives. Further, lawmakers from cities with balanced schools favored the bill more than those from cities with imbalanced schools.

The suburbs have in effect presented the cities with a solution to a problem that is exclusively the cities'. They have not offered to bus some of their students in town and accept kids from the inner city. They have not agreed to voluntarily end their snob zoning that keeps the poor out of their exclusive neighborhoods. They have not changed the lily white composition of their schools. Some schools have accepted METCO students, really a token gesture.

If the suburban legislators were really interested in ending racial imbalance and providing quality education to all the citizens of the state, they would develop a system that would give more state aid to poorer communities and less to richer communities. This would mean more money for Boston, New Bedford and Springfield and less for Needham, Holden and other bedroom communities. Not only are the cities faced with greater problems in raising money but they have to have programs for people who speak Spanish and other languages. This is an expense that the small, richer communities do not have to face.

It would be wrong to blame all the problems of racially balancing city schools on the suburbs. In Boston for instance the School Committee has made this a political issue. I use the word political here in its adverse sense. Some members of the school committee have tried to further their careers by taking a particular stand on bussing. The constant bickering between the School Committee and the Board of Education has not given them ample opportunity to inform parents where their children will be going to school next year and why. This has increased fears among adults. While all the blame for the current problems of city school systems cannot be given to the suburbs it can be said they have done damn little to help.

Impeach Nixon!

Impeach Nick!

Jump on the band wagon!

Impeachment of Student Government Association (SGA) President Nick Apostola was the topic of a motion made by the seven area government presidents at the March 20 Student Senate meeting.

The group accused Apostola of ignoring student rights and interests and of centralizing power in the office of SGA president.

Murmurings around the SGA offices suggest that the motion was not made by student representatives concerned with student rights at all, but by people concerned with having been promised power of their own which they never received.

Of the group sponsoring the motion Apostola says, "They're interested in grandisement of their own positions, not in decentralization."

He explains further that, "They say that I'm not decentralizing power as I promised to do. It all depends what you mean by decentralization. I haven't given more power to the area governments but have gone directly to the students."

He calls the motion for impeachment "a downright spiteful move."

Apostola claims that he has pushed for student unionization and for a representative town meeting form of student government so that students would have more of a voice in government.

He cannot understand why the area presidents are trying to impeach him when there are only three weeks left in his term.

"I don't care anymore," says Apostola. "If they're going to play those games the only people who will lose are the students."

I do not support Apostola. I do agree, however, that the people in SGA are so busy playing games that they don't accomplish anything for the students at this university.

We sneer at the back stabbing and back-room politicking that goes on at local and national governmental levels. But here at UMass we aren't doing anything different.

At a time when student political activism is at a standstill, the few people who are interested in student government are busy playing power games.

While we're cleaning house we might as well get rid of the whole damn mess of SGA people.

Yeah, there would be chaos. Everything would be disorganized for awhile. But this is UMass, not the real world. Maybe we could use a little chaos every now and then.

Henry Ragin, where are you?

Want to be in pictures? Try this film workshop

UMass, through the Student Activities Office, actively participates as a member of the National Entertainment Conference which is characterized by its uniqueness in the field of entertainment. The NEC, a non-profit organization, is the largest national student-staff association concerned exclusively with aid, information, and education relating to collegiate extra-curricular activities. NEC is devoted to developing through its services and programs, professionalism and expertise among its members with regard to planning, booking, and presenting programs on campus.

The NEC, which was started in 1960 in North Carolina by a group of educators who were concerned about the rising cost of entertainment and the problems schools faced in presenting talent on the various campuses, has grown to over 300 schools and 100 agencies. The NEC deals with all avenues of the programming and entertainment field: classical, semi-classical, and popular music, films, lectures, theatre, outdoor activities, art exhibits, video tape, travel, and recordings. Since the organization is concerned with rising artist prices, unequal advantages, cooperative buying, sharing information and "ills" of the entertainment business, it devotes much time to handling these problems.

In the area of film programming, NEC has organized a special project in conjunction with Warner Brothers. Each member institution has the opportunity to participate in this project.

UMass through the Campus Center Program Council Movie Committee has this year, as in the past, been a participant in the NEC - Warner Brothers Project of Film Entertainment program. The NEC will offer two educational opportunites during the summer of 1974, in conjunction with Warner Brothers. UMass undergraduate students interested in film are eligible to apply for the "Film Production Workshop" and-or for the "Film Job Training Program".

The "Film Production Workshop" is designed as a collective experience giving all participants an opportunity to direct, edit, act, do camera, sound, lights and research. This Workshop will be conducted from July 25th to August 14th at the University of Iowa. This summer will be the fourth year for the Workshop and the third year that it will be held at the University of Iowa in cooperation with the Division of TV and Film. Ray Kril, formerly of the University of Iowa, now an independent film producer, and Brian Lewis, film instructor at the University of Iowa, will direct the Workshop.

In the "Film Job Training Program" the participants will learn by observing skilled craftsmen in the performance of their specialities at the Burbank Studios, Hollywood, California. Five summer job scholarships will be awarded for this workshop which will run from June 24th through August 16th, 1974.

Cost of Living Council hopes prices will stay down

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Cost of Living Council hopes to get price-restraining commitments from industries still subject to price and wage controls before its legal authority ends, a council official said yesterday.

"One has to operate as if there is a tomorrow," said Don R. Conlan, associate director of economic policy.

With less than a month to go before the end of the current controls program on April 30, the council lifted controls from about 165 inflation-prone industries.

Conlan said he didn't think there would be sharp increases in prices as a result of Monday's decontrol action beyond what is justified.

But the council is worried about future price behavior of those parts of the economy still under control, which include steel, food, construction, health, copper, retail auto sales and machinery. Only about 24 per cent of all consumer prices remain subject to price controls.

Conlan said the council will continue to seek price-restraining or supply-boosting commitments from industries where it can in exchange for decontrol prior to April 30.

Steel and food are two trouble areas where such commitments are being sought. The council wants to continue controls over health and construction after April 30.

Congress has so far indicated it favors ending all controls on April 30.

Asked how the council could get commitments from industries to restrain future price actions with the end of controls apparently less than a month away, Conlan said cost pressures and the possibility Congress could change its mind at the last minute may induce industries to make commitments.

Industries decontrolled included the apparel industries, most financial institutions, large restaurants, the entertainment industry, manufacture of a large variety of consumer goods, the Postal Service, hotels and furniture and home furnishings.

Hope for electric price relief dims

By DAVID C. MARTIN
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) - Federal energy officials held out little hope Tuesday of any immediate relief from recent increases in the electric bills of northeastern consumers.

Deputy energy chief John C. Sawhill told a gathering of elected officials from northeastern states that the problem would not be solved until New Englans starts building its own oil refineries, a process that would take three years if work began immediately.

Until then, Sawhill said, New England would remain dependent on the higher priced petroleum products coming from overseas and would continue to pay higher utility bills than the rest of the country.

Sawhill added that the price of imported petroleum could be expected to decline from its current level as a result of the increased supplies made available by the lifting of the Arab oil embargo, but he declined to predict when or how much.

"There isn't much relief in sight," Rep. Silvio O. Conte, R-Mass., concluded.

Several New England congressmen pointed out that the Emergency Petroleum Allocation act passed last year requires the administration to insure "equitable," pricing throughout the country.

Sawhill responded that the Federal Energy Office did not take "equitable" to mean "equal" and said it would be "extremely complicated," to set up a program that would guarantee a uniform price for oil nationwide.

Rep. Ella T. Grasso, D-Conn., asked why it would be so difficult. "It's a matter of simple mathematics," she said.

Sawhill replied that people in otherparts of the nation would not be willing to pay higher fuel prices in order to subsidize New England consumers. He added that the FEO had withdrawn a proposed plan for equalizing fuel prices within the New England region when it met with intense local opposition.

Other than a subsidy, Sawhill suggested that a tax credit for consumers forced to pay the higher foreign price would be the only quick way of providing price relief. However, he said he did not know whether the administration could support such a proposal.

Conte recommended to the state legislators attending the meeting arranged by Rep. Stewart B. McKinney, R-Conn., that they attempt to pass local tax credit bills instead of waiting for congressional action.

Conte also noted that the House recently passed what amounted to a federal subsidy for the Tennessee Valley Authority in an effort to slow down utility rate increases Under that bill, the TVA could receive credits over the next few years to meet the cost of installing pollution control devices.

Representatives of the Federal Power Commission who attended Tuesday's meeting described a "coal by wire" system by which coal fired utilities in the midwest would soon begin transferring cheaper power to the northeast region.

NH deaths down 16%

CONCORD, N.H. (AP) - New Hampshire was cited Tuesday by the National Safety Council for the greatest reduction in highway deaths of any state in the country.

The council told Gov. Meldrim Thomson the number of New Hampshire traffic fatalities dropped by 16 per cent in 1972 and 19 per cent in 1973, a reduction of more than 10 violent deaths in the two years.

Nationwide, highway deaths increased by 2 per cent in 1972 and declined by 2 per cent last year.

New Hampshire's 1973 highway fatality toll of 145 was the lowest recorded in the state since 1963.

State Safety Coordinator Thomas Power said the highway deaths were reduced before speed limits were lowered last fall.

Selectmen hopefuls debate tomorrow

Amherst's three candidates for selectman in the April 9th town election will address this week's meeting of the Project Ten Political Campaigns Seminar at the University of Massachusetts.

Seminar instructor Kenneth Mosakowski says that both incumbent selectmen, Michael Sullivan and Nancy Eddy, and Challenger Kenneth Garfield, have accepted an invitation to discuss their campaigns at the seminar.

The open forum is scheduled for Thursday at 7:30 p.m. in Pierpont Hall in the Southwest Residential Complex. The forum will be taped and aired on WMUA (University of Massachusetts radio, 91.1 FM) at 10 p.m.

The public is invited to attend.

The seminar has already hosted sessions with State Representative James Collins of Amherst and Governor's Councillor Edward O'Brien of Easthampton, an announced democratic candidate for Massachusetts Attorney General.

The Queen is afloat

LONDON (AP) — The luxury liner Queen Elizabeth 2 was reported adrift yesterday in the Caribbean with more than 1,600 passengers aboard, Cunard officials said.

The ship, disabled since Monday by a boiler breakdown, is in no danger, the officials said.

The ship's three boilers were allowed to cool down so the trouble could be analyzed. Early today the engines were restarted, but after half an hour's sailing at about 10 knots, it was decided to recheck the functioning of the boilers.

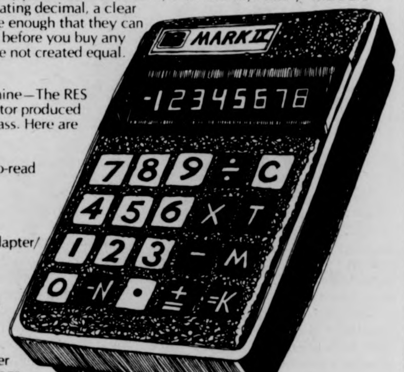
THE GREAT $49.95 ENERGY BY MAIL SALE.

When you stop to consider just how much calculator $49.95 usually buys, we know you'll realize that what we have here is nothing other than a real bargain. Just one year ago, this exact same machine sold for $149.95. And was worth every penny of it.

While there is no "typical" $49 calculator, there are several features common to any machine: the basic four functions—addition, subtraction, multiplication and division. Unlike the more expensive, rechargeable models, the primary power source is usually a throwaway battery. There are other features available too, such as floating decimal, a clear entry key, and a display with digits large enough that they can easily be read. Check for these features before you buy any machine, because all $49 calculators are not created equal.



The RES Mark IX w/memory.

An Unfair Comparison.

In any case, like we said, this machine—The RES Mark IX-once sold for $149.95. A calculator produced for retail at $49 just ain't in the same class. Here are the Mark IX's basics:

Four function capacity (as above),
An exceptionally large, very easy-to-read 8-digit display,
Full floating decimal,
Combined clear and clear entry key, and
A rechargeable battery, with AC adapter/charger included.

By any reasonable standards, the above qualifies the Marx IX as a good $49 machine. But what made it worth a hundred dollars more?

You can perform both chain and mixed calculations; square a number; calculate reciprocals, and raise a number to an integer power. There is a sign change key for negative number operations, and constant factors for multiplication and division. Lightweight (13 ounces), and compact (1-5/8 x 3-3/4 x 5-1/2 inches), the Mark IX is guaranteed six months on labor, and a full year against any defects in parts.

Thanks for the Memory.

By now you may very well be ready to rip out the coupon, write a check, and dash for the mailbox. And we wouldn't blame you if you did, especially if you've been considering the purchase of a good, all-around calc. But please!...have patience...because we've saved the best for last: the Mark IX also comes with the most desired feature of them all...MEMORY...which makes it especially suitable for totaling stock portfolios,.figuring real estate transactions, and extending invoices. It's also ideal for students, salesmen, engineers, and at this price, just about everyone else.

See you later, Calculators.

If you think we're trying to paint a rosy picture, good. Because you just will not find a comparable machine anywhere else, at anywhere near this price (which is actually less than many dealers can purchase it for at wholesale!).

So that's the good news, and now for the bad news: If you want one, please don't procrastinate. We have a limited supply of machines, and can only guarantee delivery if we receive your order during the next few weeks.

The new janitorial staff of the Student Union completed his first day of work yesterday. Eyewitness reports on his efficiency indicated that the floors were "clean, but a bit sticky."

Sci-Fi library: 5500 volumes

To most UMies, "the library" means that tall building just west of the pond. But a few dozen people on this campus hear "library" and instantly think of a small room in an obscure corner of the Student Union. The room is 434, and it houses the Science Fiction Library.

Years ago the University's science fiction readers decided that pooling their new acquisitions would give everybody more to read. From this humble beginning has come a collection of over 5500 volumes of science fiction and fantasy, including many irreplaceable back issues of old magazines.The Science Fiction Society, the student group in charge of the library, also publishes a magazine, "Betelgeuse," about once each semester.

Contributors who can provide artwork, writing, editing, etc. are always welcome. "Betelgeuse" is distributed free to members. Also free to members are the occasional movies the club shows, e.g. 1984. For $1.25 a semester—the price of one good new paperback—any student or area resident can become a member of the Society.

In the library one can usually find a fellow SF addict eager to talk about the new Heinlein novel, Tolkien's Silmarillion, or whatever. There are even reference books on hand to settle disputes. If you enjoy good science fiction and good people, try your luck at finding us. Face the back door of the ballroom, turn right, go up the stairs, and the library is the first door on the left. Be warned, however, that the Galactic Surgeon General has determined that the reading of science fiction is dangerous to your cum.

Kissinger criticized

BOSTON (AP) — Secretary of State Henry Kissinger's Mid-East diplomacy may produce "spectacular short term results," but without true peace or recognition by the Arab states of Israel's sovereignty, according to a policy evaluation committee of Boston's Jewish community.

The report is the first in a series of study papers to be published by the Mid-East Policy Committee of the Combined Jewish Philanthropies of Greater Boston and the Jewish Community Council.

The report is openly critical of Kissinger's brand of diplomacy which they call one of "ambiguities, secret understandings and closed summits.

Sensory system watches campus like a mother

By DAVID SPARLING
MDC Staff

The UMass campus, with its many new buildings and extensive scientific research, need a sophisticated monitoring system to match — and the space-age Supervisory Data System (SDS) does just that.

Notifying operators instantly of problems ranging from a burnt-out light bulb to an intrusion in a room where radioactive material is stored, SDS is indispensable to smooth operation and security on this campus of more than 30,000 undergraduate and graduate students.

From a console room about the size of an apartment kitchen, located in the UMass Physical Plant building, one of the five specially-trained SDS operators keeps round-the-clock watch on a control board that receives scanning impulses from over 100,000 sensors located in all the major buildings at UMass.

Control Panel

The operator sits between a desk and the SDS control panel. On the panel are banks of red, white and black buttons.

When the buttons are pressed in certain sequence, diagrams of building plans and individual equipment appear on two screens above the panel, allowing the operator to make adjustments from the control panel or send repairmen or security officers to the scene.

Also in the console room are two meteorological recorders used to coordinate building heating systems and three citizen-band radios that monitor calls from Police and Fire Departments and Civil Defense.

There are also four telephones in the console room, one red "hot line" to the Amherst Fire Department and a green telephone with a line independent of the university switchboard in case of emergency.

Seems Endless

The extent of the SDS operation seems endless. Signaling changes in room temperature (possibly brought on by equipment failure or fire), notifying operators of water leakage which could result in flooding, signaling intrusions (burglaries) into a locked room or building, or noting an elevator malfunction — these are only a few of the thousands of SDS functions.

Even if a light bulb goes out on the aircraft warning tower atop the 27-story library, the SDS operator knows immediately.

One of the system's most important posts is the monitor in the room where a quantity of radioactive isotope is stored for use by the Food Service and Nuclear Physics departments.

"Security System"

"The SDS is basically a security system there, used to prevent unauthorized entry," according to Jay W. Stryker at the UMass infirmary's Department of Radiation Safety. "The material is kept in a room. I don't want to disclose where, though, that amounts to a bank vault. It is monitored by SDS microphones."

While monitoring radioactive material might be its most glamourous role, the brunt of the unit's use takes place in the HVAC (heating, ventilation, air conditioning) systems of the new buildings, according to SDS design engineer Howard O. Spaulding.

"While the more exciting aspects of SDS naturally make it interesting to learn about, most SDS sensors monitor mechanical equipment," Spaulding said. "The goal we're shooting for is to optimize the performance of our equipment through control, monitoring, and security."

Spaulding said that every physical plant is "plagued" with problems and cautioned that SDS is not a cure-all, but "only one tool."

"We're constantly upgrading our effort to keep abreast of the state of the art (central surveillance and control)."

Awareness workshop

A Woman's Career Awareness Workshop for undergraduate students is being offered this spring by two staff members of the Student Development Center, Susana Krivatsy and Elizabeth Kennedy. Its purpose is to help women plan the career direction they wish their lives to take. Personal exploration, the expression of individual interests and abilities through activities and discussion, and career goal-setting will be the main focus of the workshop series. Interviewing, information on career resources, individual investigation of specific occupations, and resume writing may also be a part of the series, dependent on participants' interests and needs.

The workshop series will begin Monday morning, April 8, 9:30-11:00 a.m., and run for six sessions, through May 13, 1974. You may sign up for the Woman's Career Awareness Workshop or learn more about it by visiting the Student Development Center, Room 213 Berkshire House, 545-0333. The deadline for registering is Friday, April 5.

Water pollution, the EPA and citizen involvement

—Last week: MassPIRG Reports described MassPIRG's Small Claims Court Project and explained how you can settle consumer complaints by using the Small Claims Court.—

—Next week: A look at MassPIRG's Lifeline legislation (Senate Bill No. 156).—

By STEVE DELANCEY

Have you ever looked at the filthy Connecticut River and wondered how beautiful it must have once been? After looking into the discolored water were you able to even dream that it might someday be clean again? About a year and a half ago, the government finally began to take steps to return all of our nation's waters to their original state of beauty and purity.

On October 18, 1972, the US Congress passed the Federal Pollution Control Act in an effort to "prevent, reduce, and eliminate water pollution." The law requires that all facilities—industrial and municipal—that discharge waste matter and-or chemicals into the nation's waterways to do so under strict guidelines.

While the law reiterates that water pollution control is the responsibility of the individual states, it requires that a government agency—the Environmental Protection Agency—set a maximum level of discharge that is allowed for each pollutant from each facility.

Every source of water pollution (this includes factories, power plants, cement plants, sewage treatment plants, animal feed-lots, etc.) must apply for a permit through the National Pollutant Discharge Elimination System. The permit states what level of each pollutant the facility discharges, what specific rate of time it will take for the facility to bring that level down, and gives deadlines for the decrease of all pollution to the waters.

In general, the law requires that all industrial pollutors have the "best practicable waste control techniques" by July 1, 1977 and the "best available" techniques by July 1, 1983. All municipal sewage facilities must have at least secondary treatment (which means 85-95 per cent cleanup of waste) by the first of July, 1977. The program's eventual goal is the complete cessation of all pollutant discharges by 1985 thereby returning US waters to a condition that would make them clean enough for swimming and other recreational use.

The permit also requires that each pollutor monitor all of its wastes and periodically report to the state and the federal EPA the amount and nature of all its waste components. The state and the federal environmental agencies are lawfully able to prosecute both industries and cities that don't comply with their particular permit standards.

The 1972 law also contains an unprecedented opportunity for public involvement in the governmental regulatory program. In fact, the effectiveness of the program depends on informed citizen participation. All permit applications are available to the public. The state agencies are required to compile mailing lists of any interested citizens and groups and send them copies of all permit applications and any accompanying fact sheets.

The public has a period of thirty days in which it can review the applications, discover what the pollutor is discharging into the water, the amount of each individual pollutant, what the government and state regulations require the pollutor to do to minimize the amount of discharge, and whether the pollutor is conforming to the legal requirements or not.

Citizens are encouraged to check the accuracy of the data supplied by the pollutors and collected by the environmental agencies, report any violations they note either in the application or on any section of a waterway, and are able to request a public hearing be held on any application if it seems necessary. Any concerned citizen can present testimony at the hearings, which have a direct bearing on whether the permit is used, changed, or denied. If all else fails, the citizen can file suit against the facility to make sure that the regulations are followed.

MassPIRG recognized this call for citizen interest and involvement as one of the most important opportunities for the public to protect itself and its environment. At the same time, the PIRG realized the difficulty that citizens would have monitoring the permit applications, sorting out and understanding the data, and influencing the effectiveness of the program. In response to this problem, MassPIRG has attempted to coordinate a citizen watchdog program.

On November 15, 1973, the PIRG and the Environmental Protection Agency co-sponsored a Water Quality Workshop at UMass. This workshop provided information to concerned citizens about the new law and outlined the most effective ways in which the public could get involved.

Mass PIRG reports

MassPIRG communicated the importance of strong citizen involvement—particularly in action taken on the first permit applications. This was for a number of reasons: Among the first applications filed would be some of the top pollutors in the country, including some western Massachusetts pulp and paper mills. The permits issued to these facilities would have a large effect on the quality of the water into which they discharge their wastes. The action taken on these applications would set a precedent for how future applications would be handled. And most important, the degree of public participation requested and allowed in the first decisions would set a pattern for the way in which the agencies would treat citizen input in the future.

Ed Calabrese, MassPIRG's Environmental Research Director, currently coordinates the efforts of a number of water quality consultants in the state—faculty, students, and concerned citizens in various agencies.

When the EPA mails out the copies of the permit applications, MassPIRG and each of the consultants receives one. Attention is focused on the larger pollutors and divided so that examination of the permits is handled as efficiently as possible. The consultants check for discrepancies between the data supplied by the pollutors on the applications and information available in other reports and in state and government guidelines. The pollutor's monitoring process is closely examined for adequacy.

When the consultants finish examining the applications, the results are sent to the MassPIRG office, tabulated, and then sent to the Director of the Enforcement Division of the EPA in Boston in letter form. Often the data on the applications will be unclear or incomplete, making proper evaluation impossible. If this is the case, relevant data is asked for before any action is taken on the permits. MassPIRG then either waits for a response from the EPA, or, if the situation dictates, requests a public hearing on some or all of the applications.

While the industries that are applying for the permits are often influential and pushy, the governmental environmental agencies are frequently understaffed, underfunded, and overworked. MassPIRG hopes that an informed, concerned, and vocal citizenry that is deeply interested in their waters can help to balance the two.

Carnegie project reps at OH Women's Center

Representatives from the Carnegie Project on Women and Career Options will be present at a Coffee Hour, Thursday, April 4, at 6:30 p.m. in the Orchard Hill Women's Center. Carol Dersham and Elizabeth Kennedy will have information on the internship opportunities available for women (especially next year's sophomores and juniors) who are interested in gaining valuable work and study experience in fields that are now generally labeled "Male dominated."

The Program offers students freedom to choose a project for investigation and an opportunity for close contact with the two faculty members who have been assigned as advisors to the interns, "Career Exploration Grants" of $800.00, and up to fifteen credits. Carnegie interns have access to resources and facilities at the five other public and private institutions participating in the Project. Women from the Hill and nearby dorms are invited to take advantage of the information afforded by the Coffee Hour.

Nobel Prize winner sees no inflation end; could continue for a century

BUFFALO (AP) — The 1973 winner of the Nobel Prize for Economics, Dr. Wassily W. Leontief, said Friday inflation would not be stopped by the United States or anyone else in the foreseeable future.

"We can stand a rate of inflation of 3 or 5 per cent a year for the next 100 years," he told a news conference at Buffalo State College.

"The only ones really hurt by inflation are those who think it will be stopped and make their plans for the future in the belief it will be."

Leontief came to Buffalo to take part in the 25th annual meeting of the New York State Economic Association.

He holds the Henry Lee chair of political economy at Harvard University in Cambridge, Mass.

The Nobel laureate said he was not arguing in favor of a continuing inflation. But he said for all practical purposes, it would be the economic trend for many years to come.

"I would prefer to have stable prices but that depends upon what price you must pay to have them," he said. "Is it worth having 50 per cent of the people unemployed in order to maintain stable prices. I hardly think so."

He admitted that persons on fixed incomes could not cope with continuing inflation, but said, "Society must tool itself up to protect those affected. Social Security and pension plans must be geared to meet the rising costs."

SW women

The Southwest Women's Center Curriculum Committee has announced its course offerings for next year, and is presently recruiting teachers and more courses for the coming semester. Courses to be offered are: Women in Movements for Social Change in the U.S., Revolutionary Societies and the Role of Women, Women in Journalism, The Place for Women in the American Economy, The Experience of Third World Women in America, Sexism, and-or Racism in the Public Schools, Women's Theatre, Women's Center Practicum, Women's Counseling, Women Look at the Law, Women Look at Religion, Women in Africa, Our Bodies-Our Selves, and The Lesbian Experience.

This list is not final, and the Center is open for proposals for courses. The Committee wishes to stress the fact that Southwest Residential College includes women of varied socioeconomic and ethnic backgrounds and that the courses submitted should be addressed to the entire community. The issues of racism and sexism and inseparable, and the educational program will reflect this belief.

Energy speech

Allan Hoffman, UMass physics professor who was commended by Ralph Nader in his recent address here, will speak Thursday at 12 noon on the issue of nuclear energy as a power source for the United States.

The talk and discussion, entitled "Montague Plains: One Part of the Nuclear Power Dilemma," will be in the Colonial Lounge of the Student Union from 12:15 to 1:15.

The program is one in the continuing series of public issues programs called "The First Amendment," sponsored by the United Christian Foundation.

Hoffman, a member of the UMass Global Survival Studies faculty, is a familiar speaker on atomic energy issues. He is one of three faculty specifically cited by Ralph Nader for having the courage to publicly voice opposition to plans for using nuclear energy as a power source.

CASIAC

The College of Arts and Sciences information and Advisory Center (CASIAC) now has an extension service in Orchard Hill. You're serious about photography. So is the Canon F-1.

To you, photography is more than a hobby. You may never want to become a professional. Yet, your photography is as important a means of self-expression to you as your speech. You demand the same excellence in your photographic equipment as you do of your photographic skills.

The Canon F-1 is the camera that can fulfill any photographic task to which you put it. It can stand up to your ability in any situation.

Naturally, a great camera like the F-1 won't ensure great results. That's up to you. Yet—it's nice to know that your camera can grow with you as a photographer.

Part of the reason for this is the F-1 system. Since it was designed in totality, it offers total performance. There is nothing "added on" in the F-1 system. Everything works as it was designed to, and integrates superbly with everything else. You'll spend less time worrying about operating the camera than in shooting. And that's what creative photography is really all about.

Controls fall into place under each finger. It's no accident. Professionals who depend on a camera for their livelihood have a deep regard for the F-1's handling. It's amazing how much a comfortable camera can improve your work.

Sharing these lenses and many of these accessories are the new Electronic Canon EF, with fully automatic exposure control, the FTb, now improved with all exposure information visible in the finder, and the TLb, great for a second camera body or for getting started in Canon photography. Canon. For serious applications. For serious photographers.

Isn't it time you got serious?

Alternative education

Non-traditional students are those who are interested in alternative education or different situations than the archetypal "college student fresh from high school".

Veterans, students who withdrew from college and are returning, housewives coming back to school because of the influence of women's groups and because they felt the need to grow, and people who were working and need credentials to gain a better position or become more effective, aare all Non-Traditional Students.

The group plans to meet regularly to share resources and support, and to plan future goals. Meetings will be held from noon to 2 p.m. on Wednesdays in the Suffolk Room in the Student Union (first floor rear, across from the Hillel office). All are welcome to attend.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

For the life of the party, choose Leo. For cleanup after the party, pick on Virgo. For decorations, it is Libra. For party innovations, the choice is Aries. For the budget, it is Taurus. For intrigue, keep your eyes on Scorpio. For fun and games, it is Gemini. For food, depend on Cancer. For long-range planning to assure a party's success, depend on Sagittarius. To keep guests in line, the task goes to Capricorn. For sustained friendliness, it is gregarious Aquarius. For element of mystery, the choice is Pisces. All of us, perhaps, assume roles and the world is a stage and a party can focus on who we are and what we can be and who is the traditional lead and which of us make up the supporting cast.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Conserve energy. Stick close to home base. Highlight security. Eliminate safety hazards. Deal with Cancer, Capricorn persons. Older individual wants to aid; be receptive. Money, estimates, conveniences can be reviewed.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Friends may appear stubborn. This is but a temporary condition. Don't take others, or yourself, too seriously. Young persons test, probe and study your reactions. Be flexible. Strive to see beyond surface indications.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): You are aid by agreement made in past. Study details. You may have more coming to you than is apparent at first glance. Be patient. State case in frank, forthright manner. Leave subtle nusances for another time.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Change of pace is indicated. Travel, visits and messages are likely to be featured. Gemini, Virgo persons figure prominently. Relative who has been ill seems now to make remarkable comeback. There will be reason for celebration.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Budgetary requirements are spotlighted. You may get funding for special project. Have facts, figures available. Addition to home, which makes living more comfortable, convenient, could be on agenda. Taurus, Libra persons are featured.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): What appeared to be opposition will actually work in your favor. Be selective. See in light of actuality. Avoid basing actions on wishful thinking. One who is glamorous wants your attention. Give it—but don't expect something for nothing.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Assume responsibility. Do what must be done without waiting to be told. Associates will respond favorably. You are due to feel better, too. Work program expands. Your interest is stimulated by challenge. Capricorn, Cancer individuals could be involved.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Accent is on friends, desires, profit due from business endeavors. Love is encouraged by better financial situation. You can be practical, yet romantic. Know it and maintain balance. Don't give up something of value for mere sigh, whisper or promise.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Make new start. Stress fresh viewpoint. Refuse to be burdened by past mistakes. Throw off foolish guilt feelings. You are going to be promoted, elevated, asked to take on duties which call for mature decisions, judgments.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Travel may be delayed. Movement, change is postponed due to obligation at home. Family member may complain about aches, pains. Be considerate. If you refuse to battle over plans, you get your way.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Money, investments, savings programs are spotlighted. Experiment without being extravagant. Attend social affair. You can meet people with constructive ideas. Have fun—and learn at the same time. You will be expanding personal horizons.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Element of luck or timing is on your side. You can hurdle obstacles, emotional and otherwise. You actually rebuild what had been considered a lost cause. Aquarius, Leo, Taurus and Scorpio persons are in picture.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you have fine sense of humor. You are inventive, probably have somewhat of a weight problem and July will be your most important month of 1974.

Commentary

Sports, students big in Ohio

By DOUG FIDLER

I went out to State U. last week during vacation to check up on the situation on campus for next year. What state U., you ask? Well, not State U. as in Massachusetts or New Hampshire. State U. as in OHIO STATE.

Let me start off by saying that whatever you've heard about the place, about its size, the stadium, or the athlete's size, is probably true.

Columbus, Ohio is a big city; the metropolitan area is nearly 1,000,000 in population. Isolated, two miles from the center of the city, is the sprawling campus of OSU. Believe me, when I say sprawling, I mean sprawling like the state of Texas is sprawling.

Being a Jock, both in spirit and in major, I just naturally concentrated on seeing the athletic facilities. What would naturally be first on my checklist but the Stadium? The place looks like Harvard Stadium, except three times larger. I don't know the dimension, but a friend said that it averaged over 87,000 people per game last season.

Across the road is French Field House. What's inside that building would make our pair of Jacks, Leaman and Canniff, drool, but since they weren't there, I thought I'd drool for them.

The first thing I saw upon entering is what looks like either a large Springfield Civic Center or a small Madison Square Garden, I'm not sure which. Anyway, this basketball arena could hold 12,000 people or so. The friend of mine said it wasn't as good as most of the other Big Ten floors, but I told him it would do us just fine in Amherst.

Outside of the arena on the walls were pictures of players and teams from the past. I quickly spotted those teams from that five year period between 1958 and 1963 that had the likes of John Havlicek, Bailey Howell, John Lucas, Larry Sigfried, and Frank Howard playing on them. Whew, I thought, what years those must have been!

Across the way from the arena was the OSU hockey rink. What a beautiful rink that was. It would be enough to make Bill Ballou pack up and leave for Columbus tomorrow if the hockey season wasn't over.

The rink has ice down for 10 months of the year. There is plenty of free skating, and skates can be rented for just 25 cents for as long as you'd like them. Attached to the rink is a pro-shop where skates, pads and other hockey equipment can be purchased at a pretty fair price.

The thing that struck me the most about the athletic facilities was the amount of money that seemed to be present. First class, all the way, as the saying goes.

The athletes eat well and I'd love to own the cars that were parked outside the scholarship dorm. And those guys are big, tall, and strong. I can see why OSU fields a pretty fair football team.

One particular controversy that was raging on campus, at the time I was there, was over the use of a freebie car given to the AD by an automobile dealer in town. The $6300 car was red with a white top, naturally, and had powered power.

The big question was whether it was fair to allow the athletic director, as a state employee, to have more privileges than any other state employee. The stand of the academic community naturally, was negative. The athletic community couldn't see anything wrong with the freebie. I couldn't blame the dealer either. What the car cost him to loan it to the AD will probably be made up with plenty to spare in sales to other customers.

I hated to leave the place. State was playing a big name school in baseball the next day. But with strains of "Goodbye, Columbus" and "Massachusetts" on my lips, home I came.

Al Skinner tops in scoring, rebounds, Pitino most assists

Final statistics released last week show that senior Al Skinner led the UMass basketball team in eight categories including field goals, free throws, rebounds and points. Skinner was the "iron man" of the squad with 917 minutes placed and also finished second on the club in assists. Rick Pitino was the leading playmaker with 168 assists and Mike Stokes had the highest free-throw percentage with .846, only .2 ahead of Peter Trow.

Rain dampens IM opener, participation records set

By RUSS SMITH

Intramurals: This article was supposed to be about either softball, soccer, or one of the other spring sports offered by the intramural department. But then it rained!

Over the vacation, I avoided going to Florida, because I knew if I went, I would be bitten by a disease-carrying tse-tse fly, thus becoming unable to play softball.

After the first five days of boredom, I zipped back to good ol' Amherst, hoping to get the jump on all the other ambitious intramural reporters.

Friday, it snowed. Now, I have nothing against snow, except when it comes three days before the scheduled start of the sports seasons. The snow was gone by the time everyone else returned, but the grounds were so wet, it postponed opening day ceremonies — and the games scheduled for Monday. Being a patient person, and with nothing else to do, I awaited Tuesday's action.

Once again, the weather played games with the outdoor starting date. As a matter-of-fact, right now, the weather is the only thing that's playing games; everyone else is sitting around and waiting.

So, I couldn't write about the games — because there haven't been any. And to think I could've gone to Florida too.

As I sat at my desk listening to Dave's stereo in the background, I was wondering, "What should I write about?".

I could write about the practices the dorms in Northeast and Sylvan have been having...or about the upcoming season in softball, soccer, etc...and what team will win what trophy for which sport.

And if I wanted to be real specific, I could tell you the scores of the basketball games I got to play over at the Amherst College "Gym" (at least their gym was open) during vacation. I could even tell you who's the dart champ in my suite.

But I'm not gonna! What I will tell you is this.

The unofficial starting date for the outdoor sports is today, as long as it doesn't rain. If you like to dwell in statistics, here you go: There are over 250 men's softball teams (252 to be exact) and 60 women's teams. In soccer, there are 87 teams competing this season. All of these are new records for their respective sport's participation.

Most of the indoor sports start either Thursday or next Monday. Some of them are wrist wrestling and badminton, for both men and women.

Horseshoes and co-recreational softball, the newest addition to spring sports, round out the season.

It should be an interesting season — providing it doesn't rain!

In NL Western Division

Pitching could power Reds to pennant

Editor's note: Columnist Bob Estelle examines the major league baseball teams in a four part series. In this first part he looks at the Western Division of the National League.

By BOB ESTELLE

As the title indicates, Cincinnati will be tough to beat. There are three clubs in the division that can challenge them, but they're just too good. The summaries should show why.

CINCINNATI REDS (1ST)

The Reds added Clay Kirby to their mound core. If he produces like some say he can, watch out. Remember Gary Nolan? If he can come back, there's another plus. Then you have Jack Billingham and Don Gullett. Roger Nelson is also back, coming off an injury. Then there is the bullpen with Tom Hall, Clay Carroll and Pedro Borbon. That's better than the 1970 and 72 pennant winners.

Johnny Bench is the catcher, Tony Perez is at first, Joe Morgan plays second, Dave Concepcion returns from the injury list to shortstop and Dan Driessen will be at third.

Pete Rose and newly acquired Merv Rettenmund lead the outfield. Cesar Geronimo, Ed Armbrister and Ken Griffey will battle it out for the other outfield spot. It looks good for Cincy.

HOUSTON ASTROS (2ND)

Preston Gomez takes over as the Houston manager. He should have a stronger team than Leo Durocher did last year. The mound core starts off with Larry Dierker, Dave Roberts, Don Wilson and Claude Osteen. Fred Gladding has retired so the relievers will be Fred Scherman and Jerry Johnson, both acquired in off-season trades. Roger Craig, who developed the San Diego staff when Gomez was the manager there, is the new pitching coach and should develop this staff to its full potential.

Milt May was imported from Pittsburgh to solve the catching problem. He will. An infield of Lee May, Tommy Helms, Roger Metzger and Doug Rader is a strong point.

Cesar Cedeno is having his troubles with the law but this shouldn't prevent him from enjoying another fine season. Bob Watson and Bob Gallagher are the other outfielders.

SAN FRANCISCO GIANTS (3RD)

If the mound core comes through, the Giants will give the Reds a real battle. 20-game winner Ron Bryant leads the staff which also has Tom Bradley, Jim Barr, Elias Sosa, and Randy Moffitt. A few breaks and look out! This is because the rest of the team is sound. Dave Rader is a good young catcher, Dave Kingman will be more than adequate in replacing the departed Willie McCovey at first while Tito Fuentes, Chris Speier and Ed Goodson make up a strong infield.

Garry Maddox, Gary Matthews and Bobby Bonds make up one of the best outfields in the business. Giant farm director Carl Hubbell can be proud of his system. All of the above-mentioned players except pitcher Tom Bradley went through it.

WALTER ALSTON is the leagues most experienced manager, but his Dodgers are full of question marks.

LOS ANGELES DODGERS (4TH)

A lot of question marks here but definitely still a serious contender. The staff is strong with starter Don Sutton and reliever Mike Marshall but Al Downing, Andy Messersmith, Doug Rau and Charlie Hough may not be enough. Joe Ferguson is a good catcher. Bill Buckner, Dave Lopes, Bill Russell and Ron Cey handle the infield. It's good, but not good enough. With Willie Davis gone, Jim Wynn was imported to take his place. Willie Crawford, Von Joshua and Manny Mota are the other outfielders. Too old.

SAN DIEGO PADRES (5TH)

The Padres will be in San Diego for two more years, says the new management. The squad has gotten better but will the attendance? Regardless, the Padres will finally make it out of the cellar in 1974.

New manager John McNamara found himself with three highly paid first basemen. Matty Alou can play the outfield, but is poor on defense. Nate Colbert is the one consistent Padre over the years and Willie McCovey would be a perfect American League designated hitter.

The Padres have also added Glenn Beckert to shore up second base, but he's 33 and may have had it. Dave Roberts is a good third baseman while Derrell Thomas and Enzo Hernandez share shortstop.

The outfield is good. Besides Alou, there's Clarence Gaston, Johnny Grubb, Bobby Tolan, Gene Locklear and Dave Winfield. A good year for three of them means trouble for other clubs.

Fred Kendall made it as a catcher last year and should have another good year.

The pitching is questionable. Steve Arlin, Jim McAndrew, Bill Greif and Rich Troedson lead an erratic staff. If McNamara has any consolation about his team, it's better than the Braves.

ATLANTA BRAVES (6TH)

Look for Henry Aaron to break Babe Ruth's record within a week of the season's start, then forget about the Atlanta Braves. They have little pitching, little defense and a catching problem. They do have sluggers in Aaron, Dave Johnson and Darrell Evans but opposing sluggers tee of in Atlanta's ballpark.

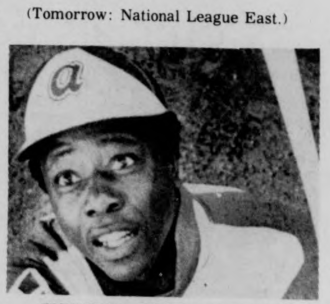
Phil Niekro, Gary Gentry, Carl Morton and Roric Harrison are the starters. Danny Frisella is the main reliever. There isn't much else.

The catcher is either Paul Casanova or John Oates and both are questionable. Dick Dietz, Johnson, Craig Robinson and Evans make up a leaky infield.

Bad Henry is not the fielder he once was. Ralph Garr, a good hitter, is not the fielder. Dusty Baker is adequate.

The hitting is there, but not the pitching or the fielding. And even though the Padre pitching is not much, the Padre defense will put the Braves in the cellar.

(Tomorrow: National League East.)



HENRY AARON'S hitting will do little to help Atlanta.

Struggling Texas Rangers sold by Short

By DENNE H. FREEMAN
AP Sports Writer

ARLINGTON, Tex. (AP) - Bob Short, who moved the Washington baseball franchise to Texas two years ago and triggered some hard feelings in the American League, sold controlling interest for an estimated $9 million Tuesday.

The buyer was a group of Dallas-Fort Worth businessmen headed by industrialist Brad Corbett of Fort Worth.

Short, who retained about 10 per cent interest in the team, said he lost $1 million in the two years the franchise has been in Texas. However, it was expected he still will come out with a paper profit of some $600,000 plus capital gains tax write-offs.

Corbett's partners in the venture include Edward "Buzz" Kemble, a Fort Worth lawyer; Amon Carter Jr., publisher of the Fort Worth Star-Telegram; Bill Harvey, A Fort Worth businessman; Dr. Bobby Brown, a heart specialist and former New York Yankee star third basemen; and Dallas businessmen Bill Seay, Charley Sharp and Ray Nasher.

Short, who was in his sixth year as the owner of the team, was criticized by the Washington press when he moved the team to Texas, and Commissioner Bowie Kuhn was not happy with the transfer at the time. However, Kuhn has since said the Dallas-Fort Worth area should prosper as a franchise.

The flamboyant Short spared no expense in trying to make the Rangers a respectable team. He hired Hall of Fame great Ted Williams, Whitey Herzog and Billy Martin as managers. Both Williams and Herzog failed to motivate baseball's worst team.

Tax officials detain champ

CARACAS (AP) — World heavyweight champion George Foreman left Caracas Tuesday after being detained for five days by Venezuelan tax officials.

The 25-year-old Foreman, who successfully defended his title March 26 against Ken Norton, was accompanied by his trainer, Dick Sadler, and his business manager, Leroy Jackson. They left for New York. Foreman had been refused permission to leave the country pending payment of taxes on his $700,000 purse and ancillary earnings.

GEORGE FOREMAN

Foreman arrived at the airport nearly two hours early for his flight and was ushered into a VIP lounge by airline officials, who presented his passport and other documents, including a tax clearance, to airport inspectors.

"Everything turned out okay," said Sadler, the only member of the group allowed to speak with newsmen.

Sadler said Foreman paid $150,000 in cash to cover guaranteed earnings on the fight and signed an agreement to pay taxes on any additional money he might receive from closed circuit television. However, Sadler declined to disclose how much the agreement was for. He also declined to discuss the possibility of filing suit against Video Techniques, the New-York-based promoter for the fight, in an effort to recover the tax money.

Minnesota snaps streak, bombs Boston, 13-0

WINTER HAVEN, Fla. (AP) — Rookie shortstop Sergio Ferrer led an 18-hit attack with a triple, double and a pair of singles as the Minnesota Twins snapped an eight-game losing streak Tuesday with a 13-0 exhibition romp over the Boston Red Sox.

Steve Brye had three hits and Jerry Terrell, Bobby Darwin, Joe Lis and Jim Holt two each as the Twins posted their fourth victory in 25 preseason games.

Lis and Larry Hiale hit long homers as Minnesota jumped on southpaw reliever Lance Clemons for six runs in the ninth.

Bill Hands, Bill Campbell and Vic Albury combined to blank the Red Sox on three hits. Hands gave up a ground single to Rick Miller in the first, Campbell allowed a ground hit by Cecil Cooper in the fourth and Albury surrendered a line single by John Kennedy in the eighth.

Veteran right-hander Rick Wise, acquired from the St. Louis Cardinals last fall, was whacked for 10 hits and six runs in pitching the first seven innings for the Red Sox. Then it was Clemons' turn to get clobbered, with Brye getting three hits for the third day in a row.

The loss left the Red Sox with a 17-7 record with one Florida game remaining.

WFL-NFL, an all-out war

Birmingham signs homesick Stabler

By HAL BOCK
AP Sports Writer

NEW YORK (AP) - The opportunity to play football in his native Alabama lured quarterback Ken Stabler away from the National Football League Oakland Raiders, Tuesday in another major signing coup by the new World Football League.

Hot on the heels of the jump to Toronto by Miami's Larry Csonka, Jim Kiick and Paul Warfield, Stabler agreed to a multi-year contract beginning with the 1976 season with the WFL's Birmingham Americans.

The contract makes him the highest paid player in professional football history, according to one of his agents, but both Stabler and Bill Putnam, chairman of the board of the Americans, refused to discuss the terms at a news conference called here to announce the signing. Asked if it was more or less than the reported $3-million-package the Miami three had received Sunday, Stabler would only grin and say, "more or less."

Instead of discussing money, Stabler preferred to emphasize his desire to return to Alabama. He was raised there and played his collegiate football at the University of Alabama, leading the Crimson Tide to an 11-0 record in his senior year before being drafted by the Raiders.

Stabler led all American Football Conference passers last season. He has [illegible] more year remaining on his Raider contract and then will honor his option year as well. That means he won't join Birmingham until 1976.

"We didn't give Oakland a chance to match the offer," said Stabler. "They couldn't give me the opportunity to play in the south that Birmingham did."

Asked his reaction to the signing of Stabler, Raiders managing general partner Al Davis, in Oakland, released a formal statement.

"Ken Stabler is a great young quarterback," the statement said in part. "He has several years yet to play with the Raiders. Other than that, as you know, we don't comment on signings of our players.

Stabler said the jump of Csonka, Kiick and Warfield had not influenced his move and that his agents had begun talking to Birmingham in January.

"I would think, though, that it-the Dolphins' jumping-will cause other players to think seriously about the WFL."

Five Colts may jump

BALTIMORE (AP) - Five starters for the Baltimore Colts of the National Football League said Tuesday they would jump to the rival World Football League if the price was right.

All five-linebackers Mike Curtis and Ted Hendricks, defensive end Roy Hilton, running back Don McCauley and safety Rick Volk-are into the option year of their contracts with the Colts.

"Loyalty doesn't have anything to do with it," said Hendricks, a Pro Bowl selection last season. "We're not playing college ball anymore. We can't look at these offers as football players, but as businessmen."

Curtis, one of the game's top middle linebackers, said the WFL "will be a viable alternative, now that somebody has broken the ice." He was referring to the signings by the WFL Toronto Northmen of Larry Csonka, Jim Kiick and Paul Warfield of the Super Bowl champion Miami Dolphins for a combined $3 million Sunday, and the signing of Oakland's Ken Stabler by the WFL Birmingham Americans Monday.

All-Pro Scott talks to Hawaii may defect

MIAMI (AP) - The Miami Herald says that All-Pro safety Jake Scott is talking seriously with Hawaii of the World Football League and may be the next player to defect from the Miami Dolphins.

The WFL's Toronto Northmen signed running backs Larry Csonka and Jim Kiick and wide receiver Paul Warfield from the Dolphins' Super Bowl champions on Sunday. Their contracts are to begin for the 1975 season.

In a story for its Wednesday editions, the Herald said it learned from a Hawaiian source that Scott "is close" to a multi-year, six-figure agreement with the WFL team.

Nick Buoniconti considers WFL contract offer

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) - Miami Dolphins middle linebacker Nick Buoniconti says he is among National Football League players listening to contract proposals from the new World Football League.

Three of Buoniconti's teammates, Larry Csonka, Jim Kiick and Paul Warfield, Sunday announced they would jump to the WFL after playing out their options this year.

In an interview with the Springfield Union Tuesday, Buoniconti said he was talking to two WFL clubs and would be "foolish and a bad family man" if he didn't listen to their offers.

"If the WFL owners are making the proper guarantees as they seem to be, I would think that a lot of players would leave," Buoniconti said.

"It's a player's market again, for the first time in a long time."

Health Minister Lalonde opposes WFL Northmen

CALGARY, Alta. (AP) — The Toronto Northmen of the World Football League may be a team without a Canadian home if Health Minister Marc Lalonde has his way, but the team's owner says public support for Lalond's effort is weakening.

"Mr. Lalonde, as far as I'm concerned, has painted himself into a corner and his arrogance has offended people all over the country," the Northmen's owner, John Bassett Jr., told a news conference Monday night.

Public surveys conducted through the news media in Toronto have indicated strong support for the team to remain in that city, Bassett said. Most newspaper columns in cities across Canada also supported the team.

Bassett said he was "bewildered" by the health minister's opposition to the new league establishing in Canada.

He claimed he has offered several concessions to Lalonde and the Canadian Football League, but none have been fairly considered.

He said although the Northmen drafted 11 players from the CFL, his club would not attempt to sign CFL players if it was permitted to remain in Toronto. But if Lalonde banned the Northmen from Canada, "the gloves come off."

'Nick is not impeached'

By KAREN LYNCH and BILL PARENT
MDC Staff

The Student Senate last night unopposedly defeated a bill to impeach Student Government Association president Nick Apostola after brief debate.

Senators dissatisfied with the outcome of the vote afterwards could not explain the defeat of the bill which last week had the backing of the majority of the Senate leadership.

The vote came too fast after too little debate, they said.

"We were defeated by an attitude of levity," said one senator.

The motion for impeachment was made by seven Area Government presidents at the March 20 Senate meeting for the following reasons:

a) failure to fulfill campaign promises to decentralize student government

b) ignoring the wishes of the students in his support of a trustee motion to allow the parking situation to be decided by the Chancellor

c) failure to produce a constitution as promised in last year's election

d) failure to attend area government meetings.

Kevin Muldoon urged his fellow senators to enact the bill, because "Apostola has failed to fulfill the duties of his office."

Dana Marchant responded by calling the charges "ridiculous", and said that these were not impeachable offenses.

Speaker David Booker called the vote.

"All in favor?"

Silence.

"All opposed?"

A chorus of nays.

"Nick is not impeached."

The entire process lasted three and one half minutes.

In other action, Treasurer Paul Hamel announced a deficit of $12,000 from last semester.

Six motions were than passed to clean up R.S.O. accounts and the deficit by giving authority to the Treasurer to take action against those who are in violation of the Financial Policy Act with the goal of covering the deficit now instead of carrying it over to next year.

Speaker Dave Booker announced that applications are being accepted for next years S.G.A. Presidential elections.

The only requirements for this position are that the applicant be an undergraduate and that the person obtain the 25 signatures necessary on the application

Trustees tighten booze rules

By BILL DENSMORE
MDC Staff

The UMass Trustees yesterday adopted a tough set of on-campus alcoholic beverage rules that, among other things, will prohibit dormitory sales of any alcohol including beer, even if by an indirect payment system of "chits."

Trustees also refused to support a seven-state proposal for establishment of a veterinary school at Grafton state hospital south of here, warning that to do so would "raise false hopes" among vet school boosters "by prematurely assigning to the University either a mandate or a site for such a facility without the necessary commitment of resources."

The alcohol policy statement comes after months of study by a trustee committee and is seen by some observers as a reaction regular to illegal distribution of alcohol among recognized student groups and concern from campus authorities that drinking is a serious campus social problem.

In addition to restating existing state law against drunken driving and sale without I.D., the statement says violators will be handled through the Student Judiciary if a student is involved, or regular legal channels if it is a non-student.

The statement says, "No student or organization may expend Student Activities Tax Fund monies for the purchase of any alcoholic beverage unless... "the expenditure is approved by a majority vote of the senate authorized by a purchase order through the RSO office.

The statement continues: "(a) residence halls, fraternities, sororities and area governments may serve within their respective premises alcoholic beverages at any time provided:

"(1) No fee is charged for any alcoholic beverage; use of chits as a substitute for cash is a violation of Alcoholic beverages Commission administrative regulations is prohibited."

The trustee statement also limits on-campus sales of booze to beer and wine only, subject to approval of the town selectmen. It says the campus chancellor must designate a "Responsible Officer" to root an application through.

In other business, student trustee and student senate president Nicholas Apostola raised objections to a proposal to increase the use of computers in administrative services, citing an "invasion of privacy." The trustees took his comments under advisement.

In their first public statement on a New England Board of Higher Education (NEBHE) proposal for a veterinarian school at the obsolete Grafton hospital, trustees said the regional proposal "raises serious and unprecedented questions not only of cost sharing, but on long range governance and accountability."

The study, released last year, proposed a $22.3 million school funded by seven states, including New Jersey. Massachusetts would pay a $6.7 million share and proportionately contribute to the student population. Since the study, New Jersey has opted for another plan.

UMass President Robert Wood said he "objects to a regional board dictating both the location and character of a vet school at UMass" and said two other alternatives were possible.

The other possibilities include contracts between New England states and existing vet schools to enroll students, or construction of a vet school by a single New England state with contracts for student enrollment from the other five.

The University of Pennsylvania and Cornell University in upstate New York are the two nearest veterinary schools to the New England states. Neither has a cooperative enrollment arrangement with a state in the region, and New England pre-vet students claim competition for space in the two is so tough that none but the most able are admitted.

The UMass pre-vet club plans to travel to Boston early next week to support Senate bill 1298 before the joint committee on administration. The bill, sponsored by Governor Sargent, is similar to legislation in the other six states to set up the regionally funded vet school.

A similar bill in last year's legislature died at the end of the session.

The Governor's proposed budget cut of 6.5 per cent would have a devastating impact on the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. Such an action would mean loss of $4.3 million, bringing our 1975 budget below the level of the State appropriation for the current fiscal year.

A party is born

By SHERMAN BOYSON

A new local political party was born yesterday, but if you look closely you'll find it is really an old party with a new name.

The Human Rights Party is the new name given to the new directions that the old Tea Party is now going to follow.

Jean Murray, a graduate student and head of the party, explained the reason for the change. "The change is to encourage participation from non-students." she said. "The Tea Party was basically a student oriented party. We want to encourage the whole community to become involved. The Tea Party has come to be known as radicalism, and that scares people."

The Human Rights Party is sponsoring three candidates for Town Meeting in the upcoming April 9th town election. Scott Blau and Richard Sclove, two Hampshire College students, are running in Precinct Seven. Ms. Murray, a student in psychiatric nursing, is hoping to represent Precinct Six. All three are running on the platform of the Human Rights Party. "This gives us a chance to organize." Blau pointed out. "You can gain more power if you are working through a party."

The candidates from Human Rights feel that they are giving the people "a chance to know what they are voting for." "People are voted in just because they are known by someone" Murray explained. "We will give the people a criteria to vote on."

The party's platform is contained in a list of 12 articles that they have placed on the agenda of the 1974 Annual Amherst Town Meeting. Some of the articles deal with lessening the penalties for use of marijuana, legalization of streaking, and public funding of alternative schools.

The party proposes to make the University of Massachusetts a seperate town precinct. Presently the university campus population is divided among three of the seven town precincts. The proposal would make an entirely new eighth precinct consisting of only the university. This, in effect, would insure that the town meeting would always have students from UMass as elected officials. "Right now," Murray said, "the university's voting power is broken. A new precinct would make it less divided, and encourage students to participate if they knew a student would be elected."

An article dealing with the pursuit of personel liberty proposes that "streaking, defined as public nudity while running at large for the purpose of free expression or recreation, shall be permitted."

The marijuana article endorses the lessening of the penalty of possesion of one ounce or less of marijuana to a fine of five dollars. This is similar to the law in effect at the Ann Arbor campus of the University of Michigan. The proceeds of the fines would be used to distribute drug information, and provide free drug abuse rehabilitation.

Realistically, the party does not expect all the proposals to be adopted this year. Some, such as the establishment of a hitchhiking organization, are expected to be accepted. The main idea of the party is to make the issues known, with hopes of making them legislation in the future.

Octavius Rowe speaks to Black Scientists

By CAROL INGRAM

Tuesday night, the Black Scientist Society of the University of Massachusetts sponsored a lecture by Octavius Rowe, director of the Roxbury Medical Technical Institute, (RMTI).

Rowe's topic was centered around the issue of how blacks should consider careers in the health professions. He also dealt with the component of allied health professionals. In addition to the discussion he showed what Roxbury Medical Technical Institute was all about.

"The reason so many black students are turned down at the major medical and technical schools," noted Rowe, "is that their grades in the maths and sciences are low."

RMTI attempts to change that by encouraging students to study many of the sciences. The school is completely accredited, and teaches students from kindergarten to 12th grade.

Rowe is a native of North Carolina and a graduate of Saint Augustine's College in Raleigh. He did graduate work in education at Oklahoma State, Springfield College and Harvard.

After teaching jobs in New Bedford and Boston, Rowe went to work at the South End Boy's Club. He has also directed camps in New Hampshire for the Black Big Brothers, and served as director of the youth and education programs for Boston's Urban League.

"There is a nationwide shortage of black doctors, dentists, registered nurses and pharmacists," Rowe said.

"Here in Roxbury there are only two practicing doctors that service some 110,000 people."

This Society has neglected to provide middle-class America, heretofore with the proper sensitivity towards black people, it is here and now that black people must take up their own struggle and help themselves, said Octavius Rowe.

Most of the Black community did not know about this event mostly due to the fact that yesterday's news story, which was released by the Black Science Society, was not published in the Collegian.

Defining a family in Amherst

By DENNY MATTEAU

In a 7-2 decision, the United States Supreme Court on April 1 upheld a Long Island, N.Y., village's zoning ordinance which states that more than two unrelated persons cannot share a household. The case in question involved six college students of both sexes, according to the Boston Globe, who rented a house in Belle Terre in 1971. Three of the students challenged the case, taking as their argument that the law violated rights of equal protection, privacy, and association.

Allen Torrey, Amherst Town Manager, said in a Collegian interview yesterday that Amherst has a zoning ordinance similar to that in Belle Terre, except that it allows four unrelated persons to share a household, rather than just two.

"We have a definition of Family," he said, "that is found in the bylaws, roman numeral 13, section 2: A. an individual, B. a group related by marriage, blood, or adoption, and C. a group of unrelated people not to excede four."

"Our bylaw has never been challenged", he said, and, referring to the Supreme Court decision, he went on, "You won't really see development on this issue until the legal digests are out and we have had time to study it."

"It does get into public health, welfare, and morals." he said.

Statistics as to the number of households involving more than two or three unrelated individuals in Amherst are not readily available. The Collegian sampled major apartment rental agencies, asking what proportion of their business is done with persons seeking to share households, and all agents contacted said they did not have such an estimate available.

However, a spokeswoman for Amherst Realty said, "I'd say half the people who come to us are unrelated."

We got a well paid faculty

(AP) — The average salary of a University of Massachusetts faculty member here is nearly $4,000 higher than that of the average professor elsewhere, the Daily Hampshire Gazette reported yesterday.

The Northampton Newspaper said the average faculty salary at the Amherst campus is $19,427. That figure is $3,800 higher than the national average reported in an American Association of University Professors survey released this week, the Gazette said.

The report dealt only with university salaries at the Amherst campus.

It found that the average faculty salary was $1,060 higher than it was a year ago, and was apt to go higher under pending legislation.

Up for consideration in Boston are a 6.2 per cent cost of living increase and Gov. Francis W. Sargent's budget recommendation which would mean an average $2,000 increase.

The newspaper based its story on figures made available by the university.

Among other findings:

—773 faculty members and nonteaching professional personnel earn more than $20,000.

—379 earn above $25,000.

—143 have incomes of more than $30,000.

—11 people have salaries higher than $35,000, topped by Chancellor Randolph Bromery at $42,048.

A recent campus study found faculty working a 56-hour average work week, Gluckstern said.

2 Cashin streakers nabbed in the flesh

By SAMUEL HASSAN

Two Charlestown men visiting a hometown friend living in Cashin were arrested in the nude early Saturday night by campus police, it was learned yesterday.

James Devlin, 18, and Paul Butler, 20, were arrested and charged with disorderly conduct. They will answer the charges this Saturday, at 9 a.m. in Northampton District Court.

Mark Chisholm, the friend they were visiting, said that his friends were riding up and down the elevators in the buff after a lot of beer drinking and "about five hours of very rowdy behavior."

Campus Police, acting on a tip, arrived at the scene and rode up the elevators. The car stopped at the third floor where the two streakers were waiting to board. The police chased them into the room they were visiting, arrested them, and after about 20 minutes of coaxing had them dress and took them to the Campus Police Station.

From there they were taken first to the Amherst Police Station then to Northampton where they were charged, held for drunkenness, and later returned to the Amherst station for release on $10. bail each. They returned to the Sylvan dorm by 2 a.m.

Chisholm, who had returned to school Saturday with four friends from home, said of the Police, "We drank five cases of beer and they asked us if we were drinking. They were like the Keystone Cops."

Police reportedly said the two wouldn't have been charged had they been dorm residents.

Keeping the smokestacks from blowing

By DONALD WILHELM
MDC Staff

Three years ago the UMass power plant was cited by pollution authorities as exceeding permissible amounts of smokestack discharge, and threatened with legal action.

Theodore deLesdernier, Chief Utility Engineer at the Physical Plant Department, described what has happened since then.

"UMass is building a brand-new oil-fired power plant near Tillson Farm in this present time of the energy crisis and the oil shortage. First proposed in 1968, construction started in 1972, well before the advent of the energy crisis.

"After the ecological outcry of the late sixties and the drive to clean up the air, UMass looked into the cost of altering our present coal-fired plant, which proved so expensive — almost a million dollars — as to make building a new plant, one that would meet Federal and State pollution requirements, (financially) far more feasible.

"Also, it was felt that due to the fact that oil flows through pipes to the burners, as opposed to coal which has to be shoveled onto conveyor belts, which in turn require daily greasing, the labor savings would be considerable.

"The present coal plant will be kept intact and in working order. But few, if any, pollution abatement measures will be undertaken on it, as few have been since legal action was threatened.

"At present, particulate emission occasionally goes over the limit, but Physical Plant monitering has indicated that emissions for sulphur and nitrous oxides are under the legal limit.

"The next questions are obvious — If there is an oil shortage, if there is a brand-new oil plant meeting pollution requirements, and if UMass has to use an older coal-fired plant that doesn't meet pollution requirements, due to a lack of oil, where does that leave us? Are we in approximately the same ecological bind that we were in when all this started?"

Mr. DeLasdernier feels that for the next few years there won't be any substantial problems in procuring oil. But if oil really becomes short, our old coal plant, hastle and all, will be pressed into service, with legal anti-pollution action being averted by waivers from pollution authorities.

A wide array of difficulties intrudes into modernizing the old plant, which was built in several stages. Four smaller coilers are on their last legs. Three larger ones are about halfway there. The smokestacks would have to doubled in height. The boiler design might have to be altered. And dust filters would have to be installed in the smokestacks.

Then, low-polluting, low-sulfur coal, which the plant presently uses, is in short supply, due to sudden demand and limited production capabilities. Since the EPA has started clamping down on power plants, the demand for low-sulfur coal has skyrocketed, whereas new mines and extended production have failed to follow suit. Strip-mining has fallen into disrepute, in large part due to mining companies' unwillingness to landscape a mining area so it can support life after the shovels have moved on. And, ironically, in our time of bankrupt railroads, there is the perrenial freight-car shortage.

The new plant, which should be operating in a couple of months, will run on No. 6 fuel oil or on natural gas, both of which may soon be in short supply. Oil cost less than coal in 1972, when construction of the new plant was started — now it costs twice as much as coal.

Paul Hamel: 'Rather remain obscure'

By MICKIE HALL
MDC Staff

A good deal of power exists in being the senate treasurer, but Paul Hamel has never viewed his position in this respect.

"I would rather remain obscure and have people feel that I am doing my job to the best of my ability," Hamel said.

"It does not matter that an organization like you, rather that they trust you and know that you are able to handle your job," he added.

Many people depend on Hamel for anything from wanting a typewriter fixed to needing a car to reviewing operational costs of the senate.

"No matter what job there is you get in trouble when you stop treating people like humans and begin treating them like numbers," Hamel said.

Hamel's interest got started during his freshman year when he was elected to the senate from John Adams. He became a member of the finance committee and then its chairman during his sophomore year.

As chairman he worked closely with Bob Chiller, the senate treasurer at that time. Chiller created new ideas and Hamel put them through.

Hamel ran for senate treasurer at the end of his sophomore year and emerged as the winner.

"The basic job of the senate treasurer is to keep the books balanced, but even more important is to develop new ways to fulfill the wants of the students," Hamel said.

One of his responsibilities is the student activities tax fund. Hamel must make sure that it is spent properly and that it is spent within set policies.

The finance committee and Hamel are presently working on a system that would make better use of the student's money. The plan calls for giving money to programs within an activity rather than giving an activity a certain sum to do with as they please. This would cause a priority system to develop within an activity.

At this time, Hamel plans on running for his position again at the end of this year.

"It takes a year to become competent within the job," he added.

Hamel is majoring in food science and surprisingly not in the field of business.

"This gives me a taste of two worlds," he said.

Hamel still lives on campus and plans to in the future.

"This way I can remain sensitive to student needs," he added. "I have to put up with such things as the noise and dining commons food just like they do."

Fighting against tuition hike

By BOB MACKAY
MDC Staff

Legislation which could have raised the UMass tuition to $2,000 was reported out unfavorably by the Education Committee at the State House earlier this week.

But, several legislators have warned that next year tuitions at state colleges could rise drastically. Students here and at other state colleges, seeing the possible threat to the freedom of public education, are coordinating efforts to express their concern.

University State Communications Council (U.S.C.C.) RSO 667, is sponsoring a meeting tonight for all students concerned about the possible tuition crisis. The meeting will be held in room 168 of the Campus Center at 9:30 p.m.

Rick Hardy, Chairman of the U.S.C.C., is urging UMass students to attend. Chairman Hardy also advises students to have their parents write to legislators.

State Rep. James G. Collins (D-Amherst) and Sen. John W. Olver (D-Amherst) will both be at the meeting. Rep. Collins is a graduate of UMass-Amherst and is on the Education Committee. The local legislator is very concerned about the threat posed to state schools.

"Even now, there are vast segments of the population which are locked out of obtaining a higher education," said Rep. Collins. "Tuition jumps at the state schools will make it impossible for middle and low-income families to attend college."

Low income and minority student spokesmen are especially invited to tonight's meeting.

Chapin testifies

Haldeman knew about dirty tricks

WASHINGTON (AP) — Dwight L. Chapin, denying anew that he lied to a federal grand jury, told his perjury trial yesterday, "I had no reason to withhold any answers."

Chapin, the last of three defense witnesses, testified, however, he tried to keep from the grand jury the fact that H. R. Haldeman, the former White House chief of staff, had approved the activities of political prankster Donald H. Segretti.

The 33-year-old former appointments secretary to President Nixon is charged in three counts with making false statements when he testified last April before the grand jury.

A fourth count — that he lied in saying he didn't know how much Segretti was paid — was dismissed by U. S. District Judge Gerhard A. Gesell after the prosecution rested its case.

The defense rested in late afternoon, but only after prosecutors had won from Chapin an admission that he had misstated facts to the FBI in two interviews.

Chapin admitted that he had received some of Segretti's fake literature in the mail.

"If I had been concerned that Segretti was going to do something that was embarrassing to the President of the United States he would not have been out there," Chapin said of the man he recruited to sabotage Democratic campaigns.

Chapin also said that the President "never in any way was aware of Mr. Segretti's activities."

Gesell said that closing arguments would be today and that the case can go to the jury by noon.

Each count against Chapin carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a $10,000 fine.

Assistant Special Prosecutor Richard J. Davis asked Chapin why he left blanks in two paragraphs of a chronology of his activity that he left with former presidential counsel John W. Dean on March 1, 1973, when Chapin left the White House for a job with United Air LInes.

One of those paragraphs begins:

"Gordon Strachan brought the subject to the attention of ——— and Herbert Kalmbach at a White House meeting. It was approved for Segretti to be hired."

The blank space, Chapin said, referred to Haldeman.

Later in the memorandum there is a reference to checks by G. Gordon Liddy of an agent in the field and Strachan "checked two people" about it.

The reference, Chapin said, was to Haldeman and John N. Mitchell, the former attorney general.

"Why did you leave them blank?" asked Chapin's attorney, Jacob A. Stein.

"I didn't want to involve Haldeman."

Tornadoes kill many in South, Midwest

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

A murderous battery of tornadoes smashed into side sections of the South and Midwest yesterday, killing more than 20 people and causing extensive damage and injuries.

Eleven deaths were reported in Indiana alone.

Seven deaths were reported in Kentucky, with other deaths reported in Illinois, Ohio and Tennessee.

Georgia also was hit but no deaths were reported there.

The Kentucky deaths came as a series of twisters swept through the state. State police said two persons died in the Elizabethtown area, three north of Irvington, one at Samuels and one in Simpson County.

One tornade hit Monroe Central High School in eastern Indiana, and six students were hospitalized.

Hospital officials in Decatur, Ill., said one person was killed from a twister there. The Ohio Highway Patrol said another tornado had caused multiple deaths in Xenia, but could not say how many.

The National Weather Service in Kansas City had issued a tornado watch for a large swath of the country's midsection from Tennessee to Illinois.

The string of twisters sliced through central and southeastern Indiana.

Eight houses and a fire station were reported destroyed at Fountaintown, Ind., and a metal frame construction company warehouse was lifted off the gound and carried about a mile, officials said.

Meanwhile, dozens of tornadoes slashed across Illinois and the Ohio Vallev.

Prosecution witnesses relate role in Yablonski murder

MEDIA, Pa. (AP) — Prosecution witnesses testified yesterday that two hired killers bought cars within hours after they assassinated Joseph "Jock" Yablonski.

Former United Mine Workers president W. A. "Tony" Boyle, 72, is on trial for murder in the slaying of his union rival.

Two of the confessed killers, Claude Vealey and Paul Gilly, both of Cleveland, already have testified about how they and Aubran W. Martin executed Yablonski, his wife and daughter.

Joseph DiMauro, who sells cars in the Cleveland suburb of Lakewood, testified today he sold Vealey a car for $506 later that day.

Donald Bram, of Cleveland, reported Martin came in the same day and bought a car from him, paying $940 in cash.

Vealey related Tuesday how the confessed killers considered dynamite, fire bombs and poison before finally shooting Yablonski on a $5,200 murder contract he claims came from a man named "Tony."

George Smith Jr. of Jellico, Tenn., the 14th prosecution witness since testimony began Monday, told the jury of nine men and three women that Gilly and his father-in-law sought to get him to dynamite the Yablonski's house.

Also testifying were the victim's son, Joseph "Chip" Yablonski Jr., now a general counsel for the UMW, and his wife, Shirley.

Passengers rescued from stranded QE2

ABOARD THE SEA VENTURE (AP) — Under clear, warm skies, passengers from the drifting British liner Queen Elizabeth 2 rode in lifeboats over gentle ocean swells yesterday to this rescue vessel for an unscheduled trip to Bermuda and a flight home from there.

On that British island 250 miles to the northeast, an official of the QE2's owners, the Cunard Lines, said a boiler breakdown that stalled the 65,-863-ton luxury vessel was caused by a fuel oil leak into the water system that feeds the three boilers.

According to passenger reports, the trouble also led to the shutdown of a number of the ship's services, including the air conditioning and refrigeration systems. That made the water supply unfit to drink. But authorities emphasized that the 1,630 passengers were never in any danger.

Passengers coming aboard the Sea Venture seemed in good spirits. Some said they enjoyed the unexpected adventure.

Capt. Peter Jackson of the QE2 said there was a slight delay at the start of the evacuation because of sea swells around the floating gangways leading from both ships. But he said during the operation that the transfer was going "absolutely marvelously."

The sea became somewhat more choppy as the day wore on, and one seaman on the QE2 suffered an arm fracture from the backlash of a line securing one of the lifeboats.

Brian Cocup, deputy managing director of Cunard, flew from London to Hamilton, Bermuda, to take charge of getting the QE2 passengers home.

He said the Sea Venture was due to dock in Bermuda early Thursday. Two chartered jumbo jetliners were scheduled to fly the QE2 passengers to New York in two round trips. Half of them were to leave about 10 a.m. and the rest about 6 p.m.

Nixon: A few dollars more

WASHINGTON (AP) — The White House announced last night the Internal Revenue Service has ruled President Nixon owes additional taxes for his years in the White House. The announcement said he will pay more than $450,000.

A few hours after the staff of a joint congressional committee recommended that Nixon pay $476,431 in back taxes, the White House said IRS put the chief executive's tax liability at $432,787.13 plus interest.

While Nixon could have contested the IRS finding, administration officials said the President gave orders that the full amount be paid plus interest that, they estimated, might bring his total payment to $465,000.

A source who explained Nixon's decision said the hefty tax bill will mean that much of the President's personal wealth will be wiped out in one stroke.

Nixon's net worth was estimated last December at $988,000.

The source said IRS had informed Nixon that while $148,080.97 of the total claimed tax deficiency was for 1969 and need not be paid because the statute of limitations for that year had expired, Nixon will pay the money.

"He's doing this because he said he would do it," the source said.

It was understood that IRS and the staff of the joint committee on Internal Revenue Taxation were in agreement on virtually every challenged item. Difference between the amounts each group claimed the President owed represented varying calculations.

The administration source said the IRS charged to Nixon as income a large amount of money spent by the government, mostly in the name of security, as improvements to his estates at San Clemente, Calif., and Key Biscayne, Fla. In addition, Nixon's claimed business deductions for use of those properties for official business were totally denied, the source said.

IRS also held Nixon totally responsible for a capital gain on a Florida land transaction which he had contended represented a joint investment by himself and by his daughter, Tricia Nixon Cox, who earlier reported her claimed share of the gain on federal tax returns.

The White House statement was issued a few minutes after Nixon was seen walking to his living quarters from his working suite in the neighboring Executive Office Building, and his two principal tax lawyers, H. Chapin Rose and Kenneth Gemmill, were observed leaving the White House grounds.

Patricia Hearst wants to stay with SLA

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — Patricia Hearst, the newspaper heiress, who was dragged screaming from her apartment two months ago, renounced her family yesterday and declared she was joining her terrorist kidnapers as a revolutionary.

"I have changed - grown. I've become conscious and can never go back to the life we led before," said the tape-recorded voice identified by her mother as that of Patricia.

The 20-year-old heiress has been held during demands for millions of dollars of free food for the poor.

A second voice on the tape, identifying himself as a leader of the terrorist Symbionese Liberation Army, declared that the heiress to a newspaper fortune was free to leave at any time and added that her freedom was no longer a subject for negotiation.

The FBI agent in charge of the case, Charles Bates, said he did not know whether Patricia was staying of her own free will. "I don't feel it makes any difference in our investigation," he said.

The taped message was delivered to a San Francisco radio station one day after another "communique" that promised details of Miss Hearst's release would be provided within 72 hours. That message had signaled an apparent end to the two-month Hearst family ordeal during which $2 million in free food was given away and another $4 million pledged to secure the young woman's release.

Patricia's 18-year-old sister Ann arrived at the family home in suburban Hillsborough moments after the tape was delivered. "I know Patty far too well to think she'd come around like that. She only hears one side of the story...I don't believe it. She's too bull-headed."

But on the tape, the latest in a series of suddenly delivered communications from the terrorist group, Patricia said: "I have learned how vicious the pig really is, and our comrades are teaching me to attack with even greater viciousness..."

The photograph showed Miss Hearst holding an automatic rifle and standing in front of a banner bearing the seven-headed cobra symbol of the SLA.

The man who identified himself as Cinque, SLA General Field Marshal, said in the tape recording: "There is no further need to discuss the release of the prisoner, since she is now a comrade and has been accepted into the ranks of the peoples' army as a comrade and fighter. And there is no further basis for negotiations since the subject may leave whenever she feels that she wishes to do so, and she is armed and perfectly willing and able to defend herself."

Defense charges

Watergate fostered Mitchell case

NEW YORK (AP)-The government rested its criminal case against John N. Mitchell and Maurice H. Stans and the defense charged that the case against the former Cabinet officers was a spinoff from the Watergate scandal.

Mitchell, the former attorney general, and Stans, onetime commerce secretary, are charged with conspiracy, obstruction of justice and perjury. They are accused of impeding a massive Securities and Exchange Commission fraud investigation of financier Robert L. Vesco in return for the latter's secret $200,000 cash contribution to President Nixon's 1972 campaign.

In midtrial motions for dismissal of the criminal conspiracy charges against Mitchell and Stans, the defense said it had received voluminous transcripts of grand jury testimony by prosecution trial witnesses that it had not had access to before.

In reference to this material, the defense claimed:

"The clear implication and thrust of the questioning was that Vesco's contribution was requested in cash in order to finance the Watergate break-in and other recently disclosed political activity.

"Indeed, it is not too much to say from a review of these various transcripts that the prosecutors in New York were attempting to prove that very fact."

The implication was that after failing to link the Vesco cash directly to Watergate, the government settled for its current case against Mitchell and Stans.

Mitchell and Stans testified before the Watergate Senate hearings and Mitchell has been indicted in connection with the cover-up of the break-in at Democratic national headquarters.

In pretrial arguments, the defense vainly sought to have the charges dismissed or the trial transferred on grounds that Watergate could not but prejudice the jury against the two defendants.

"Watergate is not a part of this case," ruled Judge Lee Gagliardi at the time.

The question of Watergate was raised in one of three defense dismissal motions. These were to be argued Thursday in an afternoon court session without the jury.

The nine men and three women are not due back in court until tomorrow morning, when the defense is scheduled to open its case, if it loses its bid for dismissal. Such midtrial dismissal motions are seldom successful.

It was 12:40 p.m. EDT when Asst. U.S. Atty. John Wing announced: "The government rests."

Wing and three associates had interrogated 40 witnesses since testimony began March 4.

AP News Roundup

Korean protest ban

SEOUL,Korea (AP) — President Chung Hee Park outlawed an activist student organization tonight and set a maximum possible penalty of death for violating the new decree.

Park acted after antigovernment students demonstrated today in the first mass protest movements since Park issued a decree Jan. 8 banning any opposition to the present constitution, which gives him vast powers.

At least 25 students were seen taken in by riot police during today's demonstrations.

Park outlawed any act encouraging, sympathizing with or even publicizing the cause of the National Democratic Students Federation, which he called a Communist-inspired group.

The president's decree also empowered the Education Ministry to close down permanently any educational institution involved with the activities of the student group.

No tax cuts

WASHINGTON (AP)-The conservative majority of the Senate Finance Committee decided yesterday to oppose any major income tax cut to stimulate the economy.

However, the panel did agree to send to the Senate a minor House bill which could be used as a vehicle for floor amendments providing for such a cut. Revenue measures must originate in the House.

Chairman Russell B. Long, D-La., said at least four of the panel's 17 members favored a big tax cut including himself. Others he mentioned were Sens. Walter F. Monsdale, D-Minn., Lloyd Bentsen, D-Tex., and Abraham A. Ribicoff, D-Conn.

"But it was clear that a majority of the committee did not," he said. No formal vote was taken, he explained.

White House aids

BOSTON (AP)-The Christian Science Monitor reported yesterday that two more influential White House advisors are making plans to leave the Nixon administration.

The paper said Peter M. Flanigan, executive director of the Council on International Economic Policy, has told friends he will leave his post shortly.

The Monitor said Fred Malek, deputy to Roy Ash in the President's Office of Management and Budget, is making business contacts on the West Coast.

French elections decision to follow Pompidou funeral

PARIS (AP) — The French people will vote for a new president to succeed Georges Pompidou on April 28 or May 5, but diplomatic analysts regard any change in basic French position to be unlikely.

The possible candidates to succeed Pompidou, who died Tuesday, will wait until after the president's burial today before making any political statements. But analysts said they could foresee no substantial movement away from the stance that has driven a wedge between France and the United States and created major problems within the European Common Market.

"If the Gaullists stay in power, as is likely," said one expert, "there might be a change in tone, in nuance, but no loosening of the idea that France must keep its distance from the United States and Atlantic cooperation. National independence is the key word among the parties of the majority. Of course, if the left were to win, the whole situation would be turned upside down."

The French Cabinet was to meet tomorrow to decide the election date which must come at least 20 days and not more than 35 days after the presidency becomes vacant. If no candidate receives an absolute majority in the first balloting, a runoff election must be held two Sundays later. These would fall on May 12 or 19.

But all open political activity was held in abeyance until after the burial.

The energy crisis

Energy crisis impact report

Suburbia survives with less gas

Has the energy crisis left an imprint on American life? Associated Press reporters have talked with government leaders, social scientists and the man on the street to get a preliminary reading on this question. In this second of a series of three articles, the effects on the suburbs are examined.

The energy crisis-initially a threat to surburban mobility-is more a nagging irritation now in most American suburbs. It's something to worry about along with food prices and school taxes and maybe politics.

The gasoline lines have vanished, and you might even get your windshield washed again. The economic impact was not overwhelming, except for those who lost jobs or live in all-electric homes.

But something has changed, says the residents of suburbia. And planners and builders see more changes down the road.

Associated Press reporters recently visited a cross-section of suburban communities from affluent Wellesley, west of Boston, to middle-class Glendale, north of Los Angeles. They talked to people in supermarkets, service stations, city halls and on the streets.

In addition to a widespread cynicism, about the whole thing, they found a few tangible changes produced by the energy crisis:

—Most people are driving less and many say they will keep it down. "I think my husband likes the lower gas bills," said Mrs. Lyle Holmes a Wellesley, Mass., housewife.

—Gasoline shortages have coaxed people aboard mass transit. Commuter buses and trains enjoy a new found popularity. The cry now is for better service in the suburbs themselves. No one knows if it will last.

—People are staying closer to home. Weekend jaunts are no longer a presumption and some people even think twice about going across town.

Many suburban residents relate the energy crisis to larger problems challenging their lifestyle.

Rose Merisko pushed her shopping cart down a supermarket aisle in West Mifflin, Pa., a blue collar suburb 20 minutes driving time from Pittsburgh.

"It's disgusting," she said. "Everytime I shop, prices have jumped. Why, they raise them right before my eyes.

"And it seems that this energy crisis is the same old story. Everyone wants to get their pockets full without worrying about the little man. Pretty soon we're going to have nothing but the rich and the poor and no middle class."

The University of Pittsburgh's Center for Urban Research recently studied response to the energy crisis in the Pittsburgh area. Two-thirds of those surveyed lived in suburbs. Most were white, married and at least high school graduates.

Over 40 per cent said they drive less on Sundays and about the same number visit relatives and friends less often now. About 25 per cent go out to restaurants less frequently and there was a marked decline of interest in buying new cars.

Beyond that, 82 per cent were dissatisfied with the general conditions in America today. And 55 per cent said life would be no better in 1976.

"First we have Watergate, then the meat crisis and the wheat crisis and now the energy crisis. The people are telling us that they can't put up with all these different things," said Dr. Jiri Nehnevajsa, director of the Urban Research Center.

In the long run, say planners and builders, the energy crisis will move people closer to where they work. They talk of redevelopment of the inner suburbs, a movement away from the fringe of the freeway systeos. They also talk of condominiums and town houses as replacements for the single family home.

These trends, they emphasized, were there before the Arabs ever thought of an oil embargo. The energy crisis has simply added momentum.

"Developments will still be spread out, but there is a trend to move a little closer in," said F.R. Clancy, a Phoenix, Ariz., land developer.

The effects of the energy crisis are clearly visible in the Phoenix area, a 1,000-square-mile desert sprawl almost totally dependent on the automobile.

A $4,000 trailer sits in front of Richard Morrison's home in Tempe, Ariz., a middle-class community 30 minutes from Phoenix. "We don't use it too much these days," said Mrs. Morrison.

Helen Everhart, another Tempe resident, said her driving has been reduced to essentials. "Pleasure trips are out and I shop less often," she said.

The same things hold true in Glendale, a fairly typical Southern California suburb. Use of local parks and recreation facilities is up considerably. "They're not making the big trip to the beach," said Frank Perron of the local YMCA.

At Paddock's Book Store, owner Darven Paddock has seen a resurgence of "how to" books for the home. "There's more and more interest in books from gardening to building something in the backyard to making bread," he said.

And people are more interested in staying near home when they look for a job, said Virginia Harvey, branch manager for the Employment Research Agency in Glendale.

IRS studies overcharges

BOSTON (AP) — The Internal Revenue Service is still quietly receiving and investigating complaints of overcharges on retail gasoline prices, officials said.

The latest IRS figures show that since its investigation began last December, 209 Massachusetts gas dealers have been cited for failure to comply with Federal Energy Office price regulations.

The IRS said these citations have resulted in total rebates to the public of $186,236.

Officials said IRS agents make spot checks around the state but most citations are pursued after complaints are filed by customers.

Arco must supply South Hadley outlet

SOUTH HADLEY (AP) — An Atlantic Richfield station here will continue to receive regular gas deliveries under a Federal Energy Office order barring Arco from terminating the station's lease, according to Rep. Silvio O. Conte, R-Mass.

Conte said Tuesday the FEO Boston office had directed that the station remain open pending completion of a probe into Conte's complaint last month that Arco was closing 27 independently operated franchises in western Massachusetts. Conte had cited the South Hadley station in a letter to the FEO.

The FEO found that The Falls Arco station here had "shown unusual growth of 97 per cent during the past year," Conte said.

Olver wants nuke controls

BOSTON (AP) — Three legislators and the head of a consumer group believe the state should set up its own system for monitoring nuclear power plants.

One of the group, Sen. John W. Olver, D-Amherst, said bills under consideration by the committee aren't intended to take a stand on the nuclear plant issue but were designed to ensure maximum operational safety.

UNIVERSITY YEAR FOR ACTION (UYA) is beginning its sixth program year at UMASS and is working to expand experiential educational opportunities for the students of the Five-College area. UYA has designed the UMASS 200 Practicum and special experiential education opportunities for students seeking to integrate within their academic programs a full year internship placement at public and community service agencies.

There are two main options for participation by students in our Program. Option I involves students working at selected social service agencies in Western Massachusetts, either at a UYA sponsored agency or at any other agency serving the low-income-disadvantaged populations of this area. Professors may assist our recruitment process for Option I Volunteers by suggesting agencies where students are able to maximize opportunities for experiential learning or by referring students to this new option. Option I Volunteers may work full-time or part-time (20 hours-wk), receive credits from classes on campus, and receive all the other benefits of UYA Volunteers (Option II) with the exception of the stipend.

UYA Volunteers Option II involves students earning credits and receiving a stipend while working full-time in a UYA sponsored agency in a pre-professional placement.

The UYA Program invites all capable undergraduate and graduate students to apply for Phase VI Volunteer Option II positions to begin on 17 June 1974 and continue for one year. Students from the professional schools are especially encouraged to apply because these students can apply their knowledge of an area in their placement in the community. A few positions may be open for a shorter term of service. Option I Volunteers also begin 17 June and may negotiate their time.

Option I Volunteers serve in full and part-time positions in public and community agencies serving the needs of the citizens of Western Massachusetts.

UYA Offers Option II
a full year of academic credit a living allowance medical insurance
optional life insurance

UYA Offers Option I full or partial academic credit for one or more semesters
medical insurance

EXPERIENTIAL EDUCATION IN PRE-PROFESSIONAL PLACEMENTS

Students have many options to earn the 30 credits needed for undergraduates to participate in UYA. Some students arrange special credits through independent study, evening seminars, tutorials, practicums, internships, reading courses, field related coursework and "learning contracts." Students may also elect to take 1-15 credits of UMASS 200 Practicum which is the new arrangement passed by the Faculty Senate permitting students to receive credits for field experience.

The College of Arts and Sciences also offers a special 6 credit pass-fail interdisciplinary block in the Social and Behavioral Sciences for UYA Volunteers during the Fall and Spring semesters. This block is divided into eleven (11) sub-sections to more closely align the course work with the actual field placement.

Tentative placements include:

Administrative Assistant
Community Arts Advisor
Community Planner
Correctional Caseworker
Drug Rehabilitation Counselor
Education Coordinator
Family Planning Advisor
Health and Education Aide
Housing Relations Assistant
Industrial Management Assistant
Information and Referral Agent
Job Placement Coordinator
Neighborhood Caseworker
Pre-School Teacher

Legal Assistant: Consumer Law
Legal Assistant: Education Law
Legal Assistant: Family Law
Legal Assistant: Housing Law
Legal Assistant: Welfare Law

If you have a sincere commitment for positive change and are seeking alternatives through experiential education, come to an orientation meeting.

Orientation meetings will be held:
Thursday, April 4 at 7:00 p.m. Room 105 Campus Center
Wednesday, April 10 at 7:00 p.m. Room 904 Campus Center

If you are interested in UYA, but unable to attend one of the meetings, call the UYA Office at 545-1381.

N.H. death penalty

CONCORD, N.H. (AP) — Death by hanging will be required for persons convicted after April 15 of three types of murder in New Hampshire under a bill signed into law yesterday by Gov. Meldrim Thomson.

"I am delighted that the General Court has responded to the will of the people of New Hampshire and approved a bill imposing the death penalty for the slaying of law enforcement officials, kidnap murders and killing for hire," Thomson said.

In front of about 60 policemen and firemen from across the state in a State House ceremony, Thomson said he was signing the bill for "those who carry the battle so long alone and for whom the bill means so much: the law enforcement officers of our state."

Atty. Gen. Warren B. Rudman said the bill was the product of more than one year's work by his office and the legislation was important to law officers.

He said the bill makes corrections in current law and imposes mandatory life imprisonment in cases of first-degree murder not covered by the death penalty.

"This is going to make our job, not necessarily easier, but more meaningful," said Rudman, the state's chief law enforcement officer.

Construction strike

BOSTON (AP) — A strike of heavy equipment operators which idled thousands of construction workers and shut down more than $1 billion worth of construction projects in the state ended yesterday.

The three-and-a-half-week-old strike was settled late Tuesday night after a marathon session between federal mediators and officials of the Operating Engineers Union, Local 4.

A union spokesman said terms of the settlement would not be discussed until an estimated 3,000 union members voted on the terms possibly later this week.

The absence of heavy equipment operators at various building sites meant that upwards of 50,000 other workers, including cement masons, iron-workers, laborers, electricians and bricklayers, were laid off the projects.

Two degrees in five

WORCESTER (AP) — Students at Worcester Polytechnic Institute and Regis College in Weston may get two bachelor's degrees in five years under a new cooperative program.

The colleges announced that students in the program may get a bachelor of arts degree in any major at Regis and a bachelor of science degree in any major at WPI.

William R. Grogan, dean of undergraduate studies at WPI, said students from Regis may be admitted to WPI after three years if they have at least four courses in mathematics and five in sciences.

Holy Cross College in Worcester and Elmira College in New York also are in the cooperative program, which resulted from studies funded by a $75,000 grant from the Mellon Foundation.

Cape Cod crash

HYANNIS (AP) — One body was recovered Wednesday from the ocean where a plane, believed to have had four persons on board, crashed Tuesday night.

The Coast Guard in Boston said the body was discovered by a fishing vessel and turned over to the Coast Guard cutter Point Turner, which brought it to port here.

Kennedy library

CAMBRIDGE (AP) — More brick and less glass apparently is planned in reworking of proposals for the John F. Kennedy Memorial Library complex here, according to library officials.

Dan H. Fenn, director of the library at its temporary quarters in Waltham, said the new plans have eliminated an 85-foot glass pyramid which was to be built above the library.

Officials said full details on the design of the library would be made public within the next 30 days.

State pay raise

BOSTON (AP) — The Massachusetts House initially approved a bill yesterday that would grant a 6.2 per cent cost-of-living raise to almost all State employes.

The raise would be retroactive to Jan.1.

Sagamore bridge

WALTHAM (AP) — With promises that traffic disruption will be kept to a minimum, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has announced plans for a 14-month repair project on the Sagamore Bridge spanning the Cape Cod Canal.

Officials said the construction job will begin April 15 with a $440,000 grant from the Corps of Engineers.

Milford bank heist

MILFORD (AP) — Two masked gunmen held up a branch of the Milford National Bank today and escaped with an undetermined amount of money, police said.

Authorities said the getaway car was believed headed toward Rhode Island. Roadblocks were set up by police in Bellingham, Menden, Hopedale and Woonsocket, R.I.

No injuries were reported in the robbery at the Big D Shopping Plaza branch.

Thousands of demonstrators favor balance law repeal

BOSTON (AP) — Thousands of demonstrators marched on the State House yesterday as dozens of officials and private citizens urged the legislature's Education Committee to approve repeal of Massachusetts' Racial Imbalance Law.

Police estimates of the crowds ranged between 20,000 and 30,000.

The day-long hearing was devoted exclusively to proponents of 33 bills that seek to repeal or amend the 1965 law-the first of its kind in the nation-which has been the subject of heated controversy since it was passed.

The statute outlaws public school enrollment that is more than 50 per cent non-white. It requires that steps be taken to adjust the racial ratio. Its impact has been felt most severely in Boston and Springfield.

Yesterday's outpouring of opposition was led by Boston City Councillor Louise Day Hicks, a former school committee chairman who has developed a national reputation as an opponent of forced school busing.

Mrs. Hicks, a two-time candidate for mayor of Boston and former congresswoman, told the legislative committee that "any law which focuses on racial ratios is off the mark." She said the result of the law has been "a tragic decade of neglect of the real issue-quality integrated education."

Boston City Councillor Albert L. O'Neil drew prolonged applause from several hundred people in the audience when he told the committee that "no one is going to take the children away from their parents," referring to plans to bus children away from neighborhood schools.

Springfield Mayor William C. Sullivan said that the imbalance law "is a game of numbers" and predicted that the law will eventually lead to an exodus of middle class families from the city. Sullivan's prediction was echoed by Boston officials. Outside the State House, the protestors, most of them white women and children, marched peacefully and then dispersed.

The imbalance law has forced school officials to draw up an extensive and complicated school attendance plan for Boston for next fall that will require the busing of several thousand children.

Springfield, for the past two years, has sought either exemption from the law or a delay of its implementation. The legislature has approved bills granting the exemption, but Gov. Francis W. Sargent has vetoed them, and his veto has been sustained each time.

58 words a minute hot shit Ms. typist blues

By JOAN FASSNACHT

I am not adverse to having my men friends open doors for me, and you certainly won't hear me hollering "Chauvinist" in my best Betty Frieden manner when some poor unenlightened soul addresses me as Miss instead of Ms. And I'd much rather go out with a guy any night of the week than sit around with a bunch of women discussing the merits of day-care centers versus keeping hubby at home to do the dirty work.

However.

I do resent it when one of Boston's "finer" employment agencies reacts to my resume, replete with academic honors and feats of accomplishment accumulated over my four-year stay at UMass, by unceremoniously dumping me into a cubicle, told me to practice five minutes "to warm up", and was ignominiously given, of all things, a typing test. Since it was my first crack at the employment agency racket, I meekly succumbed.

Ms. X (or is it Miss? or Mrs? Anyway, she chummily tells me to call her Blanche) breezes into the cubicle some minutes after my "test", sweeps me up into her outstretched arms, and declares rapturously, "My God, 58 words a minute! And you never went to secretarial school?"

Momentarily caught up in he excitement, I beam back. Fifty-eight words a minute! Hot shit! What an honor! I feel it will not be long before I conquer Boston, if not the world.

But at the height of my excitement, my face falls. She looks at me. Her face falls. I say. But I don't want to be a secretary. Four years of college to take a goddam typing test and made to feel like a success because I can type 58 goddam words a minute??

I get very uptight.

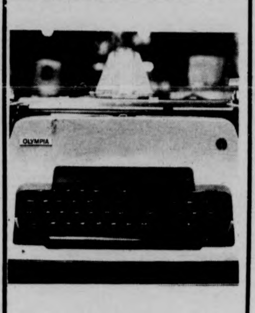
Hostile.

I show her my resume.

I show her my writings.

I tell her I want to work in the communications field, advertising or something--you know, a little, dare I say, creative.

She stares back at me. What am I, her look says, some kind of nut?



Friend or fiend?

She leans forward.

Confidentially.

She hits me with the Facts of Life.

Listen sweetie, she says, in the business world, women have to work their way up. You start out as a clerk-typist or secretary or receptionist, and go on from there.

Good God. I stare back. Has this woman never heard of Woman's Liberation? Has the business world?

She continues. Now, sweetie, what I'm gonna do for you is find a company with growth--growth is the key word here. Now, after you've been with a company for five, ten years, you learn other people's jobs and gradually move up. I'm gonna find you a company you can grow in, sweetie.

I picture myself, ten years from now promoted to assistant junior copywriter in some obscure publishing firm (if I'm lucky enough that all the right people die by then, as I have a sneaky suspicion that's how sweeties "move up"). With a little luck, after 50 years with the same company, I picture myself gratefully accepting a gold-plated watch as I retire from my junior copywriter's job.

She pats my arm reassuringly. "Now don't you worry about a thing cuz Blanch is gonna find you a good job. Call me at the end of April." Fadeout Blanche's ultrabrite smile.

I walk out. I pass through the waiting room. I watch as ten more women are ushered into little cubicles for their typing tests.

The waiting reverts to an all-male sanctum, like the waiting room of the maternity ward.

Men don't take typing tests. That's women's work. We all know that.

But so was childbirth before the Pill.

Letters to the editor

UFW up here Fri.

To The Editor:

The United Farmworkers Union (AFL-CIO) is striking in the fields of California, and conducting a nationwide boycott of grapes, non-union western lettuce, and Gallo, Guild, and Franzia wines in order to win union contracts. These contracts will insure a decent working wage and necessary changes in living conditions. One of the most important of these concerns the children.

Despite the myths about children and farms, agribusiness fields are a real dangerous place for children, who form over a Quarter of the work force. There are many accidents with machinery and children too little to be seen, or children who fall in the irrigation ditches. They are growing up crippled because of too much stoop labor at a critical time of bone formation. The children, as well as their parents are exposed to insecticides like Malation and Sevin which resemble WW II nerve gasses and which have cumulative effects. In addition to this, because of working they are unable to go to school. It leads to a cycle without choices, and a criminal waste of lives.

This can change. Union contracts provide for maternity leaves, medical clinics (financed by the Robert F. Kennedy Farmworker Plan which compels the grower to pay 10 cents an hour per worker for medical care), provides day-care centers and school programs for the children, and insures that children under 16 do not work. This is part of what the boycott is for, and with your help-si, se puedes. Yes, it can be done. For more information call Steve 546-6614, or Wendy 549-6702. Come hear Dolores Huerta, Vice-President of the UFW, Friday at 2:30 in the Ballroom.

Art $ from Mass-yes

To The Editor:

We are calling on you to become active and vocal immediately in winning support and legislative approval for an increased appropriation for the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities. Unless each of us takes action there will be no realistic state government funding for the arts and humanities in Massachusetts this year.

Write your state representative and state senator now asking them to vote FOR the appropriation of 1.6 million dollars requested in the current budget for the Council on the Arts and Humanities. In writing to legislators (representatives and senators) ask them to talk to their colleagues on the Ways and Means Committees to obtain Committee support for the appropriation. The names of your state representative and state senator can easily be obtained from the League of Women Voters. The mailing address for all legislators is the State House, Boston, Massachusetts 02133.

Additional letters should be sent to the Honorable David M. Bartley, Speaker of House of Representatives and to the Honorable Kevin B. Harrington, President of the Senate—both at the above address.

Tell your legislators what their support for the arts means to you and your community. Let them know that you are counting on their support for a budget of 1.6 million dollars and that you stand solidly behind them on this matter. They cannot fulfill their own commitments without your visible and audible backing.

We, members of the "Citizens for the Arts and Humanities" representing all kinds of cultural activities in all parts of the state, are convinced that for cultural and economic reasons the arts and humanities should be given a high priority in our affairs of state. Therefore, we endorse Governor Sargent's request that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts increase the annual appropriation for the arts to 1.6 million dollars and we urge that you use all the resources at your disposal to obtain this appropriation.

Tripoli: whose freedom ?

To The Editor:

In response to the article written by Steve Tripoli (Monday, April 1), I cannot help but be amazed at the naive assumptions behind his argument that the Collegian is not racist. He first assumes that all white America is not racist. This is a relatively easy assumption for a white male to make. Have you, Mr. Tripoli, ever been threatened by an all-powerful group of people who not only have control over your life chances; but also control over all methods of communication??? This immunity from the above situations seems to fit in very nicely with your stance that "Anyone has the right to advocate anything in what they write (or draw) as opinion."; it is easy for you, being in a fairly comfortable social position to assert this. Are you not indeed saying, that everyone has the individual right to be racist, because it doesn't affect she-he. You speak of "freedom", all I can say is WHOSE freedom are you concerned with? I could go on and on, but I feel I have made my point; I admit to being a white racist (by merely being white in America), however, rather than denying this racism, I am trying to deal with it, furthermore, I DON'T WANT your kind of freedom Mr. Tripoli, or your false assumptions and your easy solutions to everything; by bringing it all down to an individual basis, re: "To make such a heavy accusation, one should at least know who he-she is talking about." Well I don't know you and I hope I never do.

ZN, BV set new MDC low

To The Editor:

I must say that your editorial page of Wednesday, April 3, set a new low for journalism, even for the Collegian. The article by Barbara Voorhees wasn't too bad, considering the source. It was merely biased, badly thought out, and based on a premise which, had she bothered to check, she would have known was ridiculous. In other words, it was an average Collegian editorial.

This Nestelbaum defecation is another matter. One would hope that the Collegian could find someone with a little more writing talent than this bush league Art Buchwald. It cannot be easy to write an "editorial" that is libelous and devoid of truth and at the same time utterly lacking in intellectual content, but this Nestelbaum excresence has managed it.

There are a few points floating in the vast wasteland of his column that ought to be refuted, although actually they are asinine on the face of them.

This Nestelbaum claims that the Presidents' Council is trying to impeach Apostola in order to get publicity for the upcoming SGA elections. This sounds plausible, but the truth is that none of the members of the Presidents' Council are running in the upcoming elections. If that is the case, and it is, we don't need publicity.

His other point was that it is useless to impeach Apostola when he will be out of office in nineteen days anyway. He ignores the fact that this action is being taken as a matter of principle, not politics. He deserves to be impeached or he doesn't; the amount of time he has in office ought to be immaterial. Perhaps it is difficult for Nestelbaum and Apostola to understand why people do things as a matter of principle. This may be because they apparently do not have any principles. This calls to mind an incident from the past, when Apostola was asked why he had not taken the actions he had promised while he was running for the office he now holds. He looked puzzled, then replied that those were "campaign promises" which he did not feel obliged to keep. The fact that he had given his word meant nothing. That is one of Nick Apostola's principles.

With a lot of patient effort Barbara Voorhees may one day be competent to write for the Podunk Gazette and Trash Can Liner. With even more effort Nestelbaum may learn to print his own name, although I wouldn't hold my breath waiting. Rumor has it that upon graduation Nick Apostola will assume the directorship of the Richard M. Nixon Home for the Permanently Obnoxious. In any event, I wish them all the luck in the world in the future. They will need it. They will never make it on ability alone.

Boycott the boycotts

You consider yourself a compassionate person. You are concerned about poverty in America. Your conscience tells you that if you are able to be of help to those less fortunate, you should do so. So you are asked to help the cause of the farmworkers. You are told to boycott certain produce items not bearing the seal of the United Farm Workers union (UFW). What should you do?

Get all the facts before you accept the UFW claims. You may just have second thoughts before you join the boycotts.

The UFW was founded in the mid-Nineteen Sixties by Cesar Chavez. A $276,000 grant from the federal government enabled Chavez to embark on his crusade to become the controlling power over farm labor in America.

Chavez has also received generous backing from the national media, major Foundations, religious organizations, and thousands of concerned but misinformed Americans who participate in his boycotts. But his support among the farmworkers themselves is another story. For example, among the lettuce workers, where union membership runs close to 90 per cent, only 15 per cent of the workers are members of the United Farm Workers union. Despite his claim of being the "spokesman for the farmworkers," very few farmworkers voluntarily join the UFW. And Chavez is not the great organizer that the media makes him out to be. He is not actively seeking to draw members into his ranks by means of union elections by secret ballot. In fact, he has actively opposed efforts to establish secret ballot elections for farmworkers, because his chances of winning these elections would be rather slim. According to Delores Huerta, a UFW official, Chavez opposes any move toward democratic elections because "The UFW could not win a secret ballot election. Farmworkers do not understand democratic processes."

So Chavez has largely forgone any attempt to win over farm laborers by means of the democratic processes. But why should he, when he can get much better results from extracting exclusive, closed shop contracts from the larger growers, who would rather acquiesce to the UFW than face a boycott. With a closed shop contract, Chavez doesn't have to persuade the farmworkers to join his union. They join up or they don't get hired.

When a growers yields to a UFW contract, the workers are subjected to the hiring halls, the dispatch cards, and the whims of union. Initiation fees of $10.50 must be paid to the union, along with monthly dues which amount to $42 per year. For a husband and wife, this would amount to a minimum of $100. And these fees must be paid by the workers whether they work or not. The union decides who works, where he works, and when he works. And if the worker tries to circumvent any union policies, he is subject to a blacklisting clause worded in every UFW contract: "It is agreed between the Company and the Union that there are certain employees, the names of which are agreed upon by the Company and the Union's organizing efforts. The Company agrees to carefully explain to said employees that they can no longer engage in such (anti-Union) activities and that, if they continue to do so, they will be immediately fired."

Before anyone accepts Cesar Chavez as the spokesman for farm laborers, we should demand that the workers be given the right to choose their own representatives. This means in free, open election with the protection of a secret ballot. All workers must be free from physical coercion in the making of the decisions that affect them. Their decision should also be free from economic coecion. If they choose to go against the UFW, they should not be punished by means of a secondary boycott of their produce. To date, Mr. Chavez has opposed any calls for free elections. We should not be taken in by the propaganda of those who urge us to boycott on behalf Chavez.

"Instead of trying to understand the problems of farmworkers, Chavez is swayed by the grandiose thinking of a brain-trust of intellectuals, who have created a monster organization in the name of the farmworkers."

Main man Garfield

"The Board of Selectmen have collectively ignored the issue of the twin nuclear power plants planned for Montague. Only its chairman has seen fit to speak to this matter, and his first public utterance came on March 20th. Last February 13th, I urged Amherst's government to get involved in monitoring the safety of this potentially catastrophic nuclear project. It is absurd for our Board of Selectmen to shy away from this sensitive issue. Whatever happens in and to Montague because of nuclear power will most definitely happen to Amherst."

There are the world of Ken Garfield, a student at Hampshire College who will run for Town Selectman in Amherst this Tuesday. Garfield is running because, as he puts it, "The townspeople and their government ignore the students, as evidenced by the fact that no student presently serves on the Board of Selectmen. The students at the three colleges ignore the townspeople and town government. The mutual ignorance is fast becoming mutual distrust."

It would be nice to think that Garfield is wrong and that there's a peaceful union between the students and the general residents in the town of Amherst, but the simple fact of the matter is that Garfield is right on practically all bases, In fact, the only criticism that can be levelled upon him, is that he might have attacked the issue too mildly. In any event, he has attempted to bring out practically every issue that is of any importance to the town of Amherst.

For instance, he has been one of the first people in the town to come out and provide an answer to the many recent allegations of police brutality that have been appearing in Amherst lately. Garfield states, "It is my belief that Police Chief Maiah should appear before the Board on a regular basis to report on police activities and to answer any questions that might arise. The public should be invited to these sessions."

Concerning drug laws, Garfield has stated, "Amherst should take the lead in setting a policy of non-prosecution of marijuana violations."

Garfield also has advocated the institution of "Sweet Sunday" in the town center. "Sweet Sunday" is a proposal that would ban "all motorized traffic on North Pleasant Street, from the intersections of College St. (rte. 9) to Main Street from 1 p.m. to 5 p.m. on Sundays" for the purposes of concerts, picnics, or any other entertainment. The proposal was voted down on April 1 by a three to one margin.

In short, Garfield has attacked the issues in Amherst that others have been afraid to criticize for some time. He is well-versed on all the issues, and he hopes to be an instrumental force in bringing the students and the townspeople together in the type of union that should be inherent in the government of a town with the general composition of Amherst. It is not only important, but it is vital that all students that are registered to vote in Amherst have to get out and vote. There is no valid excuse for someone's being too lazy to walk down the street to exercise the privilege that has been so long in coming. There are many that fought hard for the 18-21 year old vote until long after they were too old to use it. There are many that have even neglected their right to register. But those that have taken the time to register for participation in the political process should not shirk on their duty to exercise that participation.

Ken Garfield is a candidate that has spoken to the issues, rather than avoiding them, as so many others try to do. He has presented himself as the honest, straightforward candidate that the town of Amherst has been looking for and he deserved the votes of students and townspeople alike. If you really care what happens to your town, get out and vote this Tuesday, and vote for Ken Garfield.

"Amherst is a great town, in terms of both its physical beauty and the talents of its citizens. It is tragic that since the inception of the 18 year old vote, town government, specifically the Board of Selectmen, has remained closed to students, and students have shied away from town government and town elections. I am running to change that. I want to show townspeople that we students are ready now to pull equal weight in town government, and I want to show fellow students that Amherst is the place to establish your political convictions."

Awards show poor

By STEVE DECOSTA

Thankfully, the year of the devil came to a premature end before the flick of a nose.

But, to coin a phrase from Woody Allen, the entire production was "a travesty of a mockery of a sham of a travesty."

The Academy of Motion Pictures would have been better off taking a cue from the movie they chose as best picture of the year, "The Sting," in that simple, straightforward entertainment is the best way to grab and hold an audience.

Their super production of three-hour length alienated this viewer with a slow, dragging opening and first hour that didn't see an award bestowed except in the ever popular category of documentary filmmaking.

The presentations also suffered from excessive, quaintly written, cutesy lines of dialogue. A case in point; little miss possessed, Linda Blair muttering, as she struggled to read the cue cards, "I guess the devil made me say that." Add to this the pap of the so-called "hosts" Burt Reynolds and David Niven and the evening's telecast from the entertainment capital of the world was at times silly, mostly uninspiring, and very unentertaining.

Even three-time Oscar winner Katherine Hepburn, making her first appearance as a presentress, looked drunk or at least uncaring in her stint on stage.

But the evening was not a total waste, viewing-wise.

John Huston was the most impressive performer of the night, as he, in his rugged, untrained voice, berated his fellow Academy members in a five minute monologue.

Liz Taylor showed that Hollywood performers are not all unfeeling, totally manipulated jellyfish with some funny impromptu quips.

And, in the most poignant moment of the presentations, Groucho Marx, an ill man who had trouble speaking and walking, was helped from the stage after receiving a special Oscar. One could not help but feel that as Groucho left, he took with him a piece of the Hollywood world that has been lacking from movies for so long and probably will never be seen again.

The awards themselves were somewhat of a surprise, though I must say pleasantly so.

The odds-on favorite to cop the majority of the golden goodies was "The Exorcist," a perfectly dreadful film that inspired more hilarity than horror. The Academy seemed poised to go all the way with the devil.

The first award of the night involving the major pictures, that for achievement in sound, seemed to bear out these fears as "The Exorcist" won going away, seemingly on the strength of screams and gurgles that permeated the picture.

But as the night rolled on it became apparent that the Academy was possessed not by Satan, but by the magnetic presence of Paul Newman and Robert Redford and a flair for nose thumbing.

In all, the Sting won awards in seven of the ten categories in which it was nominated, including the coveted Best Picture award, to only two for "The Exorcist."

The awards for supporting actor and actress were also somewhat of a surprise, although again in the category of pleasant. John Houseman was cited for his performance in The Paper Chase and Tatum O'Neil was named for a delightful performance in "Paper Moon," beating out the obnoxiously sweet Miss Blair.

Disappointments were registered in both the best actor and actress categories. Glenda Jackson was named best actress for a Touch of Class. Her performance in this pseudo-comedy was not of, in my estimation, award winning caliber, but it is difficult to determine if that is because of her own shortcomings or the inadequacy of the horrendous script afforded her.

Overlooked, despite their superior performances were former winner Barbra Streisand and newcomer Marsha Mason. Streisand's performance in "The Way We Were" was average for her, but an average Streisand is better than a comic Glenda Jackson, and Mason moved this viewer in an unheralded little picture called "Cinderella Liberty."

The Academy also overlooked two outstanding performances by actors in naming Jack Lemmon for his role in "Save the Tiger." Al Pacino was infinitely more qualified for his portrayal of an honest cop in "Serpico" and even Marlon Brando was more deserving than Lemmon for his performance in "Last Tango in Paris." But Brando probably sealed his own rejection slip by the way he handled his acceptance of last year's award.

Overall, the 46th Academy Awards production will probably be remembered as the year the Oscar didn't go to the devil, but simply went to hell.

Oil search reaches into the wilderness of Canada

By PETER ARNETT
AP Special Correspondent

CANADA (AP) — For a century it was labeled a "fuel of the future." Only trappers and the fleet-footed animals they hunted ventured into the wilderness of stunted pines and bog that covers the Athabasca tar sands.

That has all been changed by the bruising international petropolitics of an energy hungry world. now the multinational oil giants are focusing their attention on these oil-bearing, black spongy sands centered in the Canadian wilderness 500 miles above the U.S. border.

Huge machines have started ripping at the earth as the curtain rises on what petroleum industry officials, U.S. experts and Canadian politicians believe will be Athabasca's entry into the world of major energy suppliers.

One of the world's biggest known oil reserves — estimates range upward from 300 billion barrels of crude, as much as the known recoverable reserves in the Middle East — is trapped in sand and water at Athabasca.

So far the oil industry has scratched at only a tiny corner of the 19,000 square miles of tar deposits, a region the size of New Hampshire and Massachusetts combined. A solitary extraction plant, owned by Sun Oil of Philadelphia, is producing 52,000 barrels of crude a day.

But a target date of 1978 has been set for a new billion-dollar plant to be on stream. The most conservative industry executives estimate that a million barrels of crude a day will be flowing from Athabasca bv the end of the 1980s. That's just a little less than the amount the United States got from Saudi Arabia before the embargo.

Those experts willing to look ahead further see 2 to 30 extraction plants producting three million barrels a day from Athabasca by the turn of the century. That represents nearly a sixth of what the United States currently consumes daily.

"That will be much more than Canada needs," a senior Canadian official in Ottawa told this reporter. "I presume the United States will get the surplus."

America may also benefit from the technological development of the tar sands. Vast reserves of crude oil are held in the generally similar shale oil and coal formations of the United States.

"As we meet these problems at Athabasca then the day will be brought closer when the United States can economically develop coal and shale oil crude and win true independence from non-North American fuel sources," said Carl O. Nickle, a leading Canadian authority on energy and former publisher of the Daily Oil Bulletin in Calgary.

Athabasca was ignored in the past by the oil giants because crude was much easier to get elsewhere.

Winning a barrelful at Athabasca costs $4 from tar sands near the surface.

At Athabasca, men and machines must move and process three tons of peat bog and sand to win just one barrel of crude, in temperatures that hover at 30 below zero in winter and 100 above in summer.

Capital expenditures at Athabasca will be astronomical. Plans for three new mining-operation plants to be completed by the early 1980s call for cash outlays totaling $3 billion.

Don't sign on just any dotted line

By RICHARD M. HOWLAND
Attorney for Students

A year ago, an enterprising salesperson came to our idyllic and naive sanctuary and promised, yea verily the world which he lay at the feet of some of our sisters. And it came to pass, when our sisters set forth to take possession of their pots of gold in Las Vegas or Miami Beach (all expenses paid, he said!) that they paid the transportation, little did they know.

And what of the pots of gold, you ask? Last year they were struck in the shape of fine linen (12 twin size, 6 double size, 18 pillow cases, 20 towels of every description all in a fine cedar chest) and this year pots are pots (large, small sauce and fry, roast, bake broil and stew,) plus stainless settings for 12. Now we all can appreciate the need for newlyweds to be properly acquitted when they entertain. Some may ponder whether these prospective families are likely to be opening a hotel, however, since the supply of linen and cookware greatly exceeds the foreseeable needs of a mother and father and ten fully grown children!

However, the horizons were established and, in detail, they were described in hues of glamor and romance and the very, very perfect home. All was possible for only $5.00 per month until graduation and then $25.00 per month until retirement. For a $500 purchase the aspiring student would pay, in fact, something like $860.00 over three or four years. Please do not for one minute believe that this didn't happen this year, last year and the year before. Last year I arranged to rescind 200 contracts for violation of our laws. The year before the number was 562 and this year 35 to date.

The statute which permits citizens to protect themselves from these "best of all possible" deals is section 48 chapter 93 which is printed below. Keep in mind the following requirements:

1. The transaction must occur someplace not in the company's store;
2. It must be for goods or service or a personal, family or_household character in value more than $25; and
3. It must be cancelled by notice not later than three business days later.

It is also helpful to keep in mind that no reputable salesman of quality goods or services can only offer a good deal once. If the offer is one of quality you may certainly take the time to consider it and talk to family, friends or counsellors about it. If it's a "once in a lifetime offer," I suggest that you opt for a lifetime free of the problems it is likely to bring you. The odds are very great that the winner will be you.

The statute is a very effective consumer protection device and you may benefit from reading it over quite closely. Whether or not you think it applies to you, if you find yourself in a situation where you believe that you have a valid consumer complaint, you can always contact the Attorney General's Office in Boston or Springfield for help.

Chapter 93 Section 48:
CANCELLATION OF AGREEMENTS

Section 48: Buyer's right to cancel agreement consummated at place other than seller's place of business for personal, family or household goods or services in excess of 25; form of agreement; notice of cancellation; restoration of parties; penalties.

A. An agreement providing for the sale or lease of goods, or the rendering of services, or both, primarily for personal, family or household purposes in excess of twenty-five dollars in value and which is consummated by a party thereto at a place other than the address of the seller or lessor, which may be his main office or branch thereof, may be cancelled by the buyer for other than the seller's of lessor's branch, whether or not such agreement contains a provision for periodic payments or an extension or credit, provided by the buyer, not later than midnight of the third business day following execution of the agreement, notifies the seller or lessor that he is canceling, and such cancellation shall be effective thereupon.

B. Each such agreement shall be in writing, signed by the seller or lessor, contain his address and all the terms agreed upon by the parties or required by law. The failure to include a required or an agreed term or to deliver a copy of the agreement signed by the seller or lessor shall give the buyer the right to cancel said agreement until the omitted term is provided or the copy of the agreement delivered. In either case, the time period during which the buyer may cancel under subsection A shall not commence until the failure to include terms or deliver a copy has been corrected.

Each such agreement shall contain the following statement, appearing conspicuously on the front page thereof:-

You may cancel this agreement if it has been consummated by a party thereto at a place other than an address of the seller, which may be his main office or branch thereof, provided you notify the seller in writing at his main office or branch by ordinary mail posted, by telegram sent or by delivery, not lager than midnight of the third business day following the signing of this agreement.

C. Notice of cancellation under this section shall be given in writing to the seller at the place of business as set forth in the agreement by ordinary mail posted, by telegram sent or by delivery, not later than midnight of the third business day following execution of the agreement.

D. In the event of cancellation pursuant to this section the seller or lessor shall refund to the buyer, within ten days after such cancellation, all deposits, including any down payment made under the agreement, and redeliver any goods traded in to the seller on account of or in contemplation of the agreement, less any reasonable costs actually incurred in making the goods ready for sale, and shall return any copies of the agreement signed by the buyer with a notation indicating that it has been canceled. The seller or lessor shall be entitled to reclaim and the buyer shall return whenever possible or hold at seller's disposal any goods received by the buyer under the agreement. The buyer shall incur no additional liability for cancellation pursuant to this section.

E. Whoever violates any provision of this section shall be punished by a fine of not more than five hundred dollars or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or both.

F. A violation of this section shall constitute a violation of chapter ninety-three A.

Dear Aggie...

Dear Aggie,

I have this terrible problem. (who doesn't?) It seems that every time anyone walks into my room, the first thing they notice is the stale smell of dope. Ordinarily, this wouldn't be too big a problem, however, my parents are coming up this weekend. What should I do?

Musty

P.S. I love you madly.

Dear Musty,

The first thing to do is panic. After successfully completing this course of action, rush to your windows and open them fervently (one at a time, of course!) Thurst open your door and run across the hall to your neighbor's room. When they open the door, rant and rave about your problem, all the while rushing around the room opening the windows. Tell them to keep their door open to get a cross breeze. While someone else guards your room, run down to the nearest Munchies and buy 3 bottles of Lysol, 2 sticks of Airwick Solid, and a package of strawberry incense. Use these items profusely, blow a lot, flail your arms a lot, and pray a lot. Let me know how it goes and good luck!

P.S. Doesn't everybody?

Dear Aggie,

It's late at night and I have something to discuss with you that's bothered me for a long time about the male-female or female-male relationships that exist on this campus. I'm a 21 year old, fairly experienced male, I enjoy meeting people, male and female, but..., everytime I try to talk to a female she either thinks I'm trying to get into her pants or makes a judgement on whether I'm good-looking enough for her and she will respond. I know I've stereotyped and generalized, but I feel it to be true. Why can't people like somebody for their inner qualities and not make value judgements that because they are being friendly it is for sexual motives.

Friendly, but Harmless

Dear FbH,

What do you mean by fairly experienced? Fairly experienced in sexual encounters?, fairly experienced in playing 'The Game'?, fairly experienced in living and experiencing life? What do you mean? I'm no psychologist, but you sound very paranoid. True it is that our society is one of Game playing, but if you're continually thinking everytime you run across someone that they think you're making the moves on them, then you just may fulfill those thoughts and really act like that or are so afraid of acting that way, that you try very hard not to and end up coming across very unnatural. If you're so open and honest, sit a friend down and have him-her assess your actions. I don't want to make your feel more paranoid, but these days people are too worried about 'the other guy' Everyone criticizes others, but don't even think of looking inward and reassessing themselves. If you're satisfied with yourself the way you are, then just act yourself and wait. That's what everyone else does. You'll find someone to match your personality eventually and the next time you run across one of those females, try keeping your hands in your pockets. That way they can't get any ideas.

A note to Puckered Up: re: your two letters - I'm working on it! In the meantime, suck your thumb.

Getting choked up over hair spray

By WARREN E. LEARY
AP Science Writer

BOSTON (AP)-Using hair sprays may protect expensively styled coiffures or simply hold curls in place, but researchers say the sprays also can cause breathing difficulties.

Doctors at the Yale University Lung Research Center in New Haven, Conn., say they tested three nationally advertised brands of hair spray and found that exposure to them caused acute, temporary narrowing of small airways in the lungs.

Testing the flow rate of air from the lungs of 14 men and six women, the researchers found that flow from the lungs temporarily decreased from between 21 to 29 per cent when the subjects were exposed to 20-second discharges of hair spray aimed at the hair as they breathe gently.

Drs. Engenija Zuskin and Arend Bouhuys said in a report published Thursday in the New England Journal of Medicine that airflow from the volunteers' lungs decreased an average of only four per cent when exposed to a dummy spray of water and nitrogen.

"We believe that our observations should lead to increased concern about the respiratory effects of hair sprays and other aerosol consumer products," the researchers said in the report.

Lung air flow rates dipped immediately after exposure to hair spray, the study said, but returned to near-normal rates two to three minutes later. However, a residual effect was present 10 minutes after exposure, they added.

While there did not appear to be any obvious adverse effect from the fluctuating air flow in this preliminary study, the researchers cautioned that those suffering from asthma or bronchial difficulties should refrain from using the sprays.

Dr. Zuskin noted in an interview that the component or combination of components in the hair sprays which caused the lung responses are unknown.

The exact composition of the hair sprays which were not identified, are trade secrets, she said, and testing of these chemical constitutents is awaiting the receipt of more specific information from the manufacturers.

Only three of the 20 subjects, five of whom were light cigarette smokers and the others non-smokers, complained of breathing difficulty or chest tightness during the experiment. The majority of the subjects, non of whom were regular hair spray users, showed no subjective symptoms of the decreased outflow measureable with laboratory equipment.

"The present data show that individual sensitivity to the air-way-constrictor action of hair spray varies considerably," the study said.

"Since this effect recurred on repeated exposure, regular hair-spray users may experience repeated subclinical airway narrowing," the report continued, "Whether this effect may lead to chronic airway obstruction is not known."

Yes, Virginia, there is a devil

NEW YORK (AP) — Amid the unsettling aspects of modern times, a new study shows an increasing proportion of Americans are positively certain of the existence of the devil. Most of them regard present-day conditions as threatening, and likely to get worse.

These are among previously unpublished findings of national survey data gathered by the Center for Policy Research, an independently funded agency which studies social trends.

The results show the proportion of the United States population completely convinced the devil exists has risen in nine years from 37 to 48 per cent, with another 20 per cent considering his existence probable.

The figures were gathered a year ago, preciding the recent hubbub over demonology induced by the movie "The Exorcist."

Dr. Clyde Z. Nunn, the center's senior research associate, attributes the increased belief in the devil to a mood of "uncertainty and stress, when things seem to be falling apart and resources seem limited for coping with it."

He says that people, trying to make sense of the world in such circumstances, tend to "look for scapegoats" such as the devil.

"It's precisely the sort of climate that could lead to some rising demagogue, exploiting the sense of evil in the world and promising to drive out the devil's agents, or to some new round of witch hunting," Nunn said in an interview.

The study — results of which are to be published in a forthcoming book — involved a selected cross-section of 3,546 persons.

Nunn, 39, a specialist in the sociology of religion, said the study for the first time provided comparative data on the intensity of belief in the supernatural.

While certainty of the devil's existence was up 11 per cent over the similar 1964 survey, the certainty of God's existence was down 8 per cent, dropping from 77 to 69 per cent, although most others believe in God but with some doubt.

Six per cent definitely do not believe in God or don't know — double the 3 per cent disbelieving nine years before.

Although certainty about God has declined, certainty about the devil shows an "unusual spurt" upward, Nunn pointed out.

He said the shifting focus on the devil apparently indicated a feeling among people that events seem without reason or good purpose, and that the balance of good versus evil had "tipped in the direction of evil."

Moreover, expectations that conditions are going to get worse are much higher — 60 per cent — among those certain of the devil than among those discounting his existence. Only 23 per cent of the latter group felt worse times are ahead.

Those certain of the devil also are much more likely than others to feel that various forces in modern society are seriously threatening, including communism, crime, high prices and radicals.

Free milk given out illegally by farmer

AUGUSTA, Maine (AP) — In a symbolic gesture against the bureaucracy he has fought for years, dairy farmer Leroy Gower handed out 150 free quarts of unpasteurized milk from his natural grain-fed herd of 40 cows.

Gower, 38, owner of Gower's Natural Milk Farm of South China, was protesting the Maine Milk Commission's authority to set and regulate the minimum retail price of milk.

"A man has a right to give away anything he wants," Gower said as he defied the commission Tuesday and distributed free milk outside an Augusta supermarket.

Commission regulations requires farmers to sell milk at the minimum price it sets. Giving it away is not allowed.

Maine's statewide minimum milk price, $1.62 a gallon, is the highest in New England.

Gower said he sells milk at his farm for $1.25 a gallon because it is located in an area not controlled by the commission. But the milk he delivers to retail stores and markets that will be sold over the counter must be priced at least $1.62 a gallon, according to commission regulations.

DPW discusses reconstruction of Route 9 Fort River Bridge

By WILLIAM F. O'BRIEN

The proposed replacement or reconstruction of the bridge over the Fort River on Route 9 in Amherst was the main subject discussed at Tuesday night's meeting of the Massachusetts Department of Public Works. The purpose of the public hearing was to get input from the public regarding a location study and the potential environmental impact of the proposed project.

In a joint report issued by the D.P.W. and the Lower Pioneer Valley Joint Transportation Committee it was stated that "a review by the Massachusett's Department of Public Works' Structural Engineers indicates that this bridge has some structural deterioration. In addition, the narrow span over the Fort River is restrictive to high flow volumes adding to flood problems in the area, and the narrow bridged deck presents a safety hazard to vehicular and pedestrian traffic alike."

Tom Hession, head of the newly formed environmental office in D.P.W. opened the meeting saying that "Because of the National Environmental Impact law which went into effect Jan. 1, 1970 we are conducting these meetings to allow the members of the community to present their views concerning the construction or reconstruction of the bridge."

He also said "that a full environmental impact study will be made concerning the impact on air and water quality, dealing with both the short and long term effects of the construction on the environment. This study and other statements on the project from other agencies will be made available to the public through the C.E.Q. (Council on Environmental Quality)."

Fred Geisel, an engineer from Green Engineering Affiliates, Inc., presented four alternatives of construction for the new bridge. He said that "none of these proposals were definite and were only meant to illustrate what could be done at this point."

He emphasized the point that "the effect of transportation on the area and region should be given considerable thought." "The human factor must also be considered, specifically the displacement of families and-or the reorganization of neighborhoods which might be involved."

When the meeting was opened to discussion Merle L. Howes, a member of the Board of Selectmen of Amherst, speaking for the Selectmen said "We are aware that the present bridge was constructed fifty years ago at a time when the traffic volunes and speeds were minor compared to today...today we are seriously concerned with traffic volume, safety, and control, including of course pedestrians and bicycles as well as motor vehicles. We are also concerned with the flooding problems of the Fort River, the preservation of the wetlands, conservation and recreational uses in the area, stream pollution, utility extensions and landscaping and appearance".

He then submitted a list of recommendations to Mr. Hession which was voted on by the selectmen April 1.

James P. Cope, the Town Planner of Amherst, said that "...a new bridge spanning the Fort River at Belchertown Road is necessary to permit unrestricted flow of floodwaters, to allow safe movement of traffic, and to provide a safe bicycle-pedestrian crossing of the Fort River...". He also submitted a list of recommendations to the board.

Jack Littlefield, Director of planning from UMass said "when construction the bridge, the ultimate design should take into account the bus service the university provides...my office would be more than willing to provide you with information on schedules and busy periods..."

The Amherst Conservation Commission was represented by Wendell Dodge, and Allen Torrey. The town manager of Amherst was also present.

It appears that all people concerned are in favor of a new bridge, and there is an overwhelming sense of cooperation between the townspeople and the various agencies concerned. At present, the major problem that concerns most people is the question of the detour route to be used during construction.

The options available are: 1. The detouring of traffic on existing roads, which are all in residential areas and most likely to be opposed by residents of both Amherst and Palmer. 2. The construction of a temporary crossing, which would probably receive opposition from environmentalists because of the detrimental effect it would have on the water, land and aesthetic beauty of the area.

This plan could also receive opposition from economists due to the added cost of constructing an extra structure. 3. Building the bridge in stages, which at present seems to be the safest way fo avoiding controversy, but probably the one which engineers dislike the most.

The D.P.W. will announce a future meeting at which specific proposals will be discussed.

WSW: Southwest on the air

By STEVE TETRAULT
MDC Staff

Radio dial twisters might encounter a new station when their needle reaches 87.7 FM because that is where Southwest's own radio station WSW is located.

The station, located on Kennedy Tower's fifth floor, has been providing radio experience and an outlet for self-expression to its large number of volunteer disc jockeys as well as music and entertainment to Southwest residents.

WSW is the brainchild of Jay Ayer, a Kennedy Tower resident who began working on the idea three semesters ago. Ayer finally got the station firmly off the ground in the fall, but quit school during intersession.

Nick Minotti, another Kennedy resident and Larry Buck, from Coolidge, inherited the informal position of station managers this semester.

A survey taken last semester in the dinimg commons showed that over 25 per cent of Southwest listens to the station, Minotti said.

The station did attract many people wishing positions as disc jockeys. "We have a list of over 80 people interested in having a radio show, and at the beginning of the semester, we figured on having 30 shifts of about 4 hours each. But since so many want to be on the air, some people have suggested we broadcast 24 hours a day." said Buck.

What happens on the air is entirely up to individual disc jockeys. "We have no set programs," said Minotti. "The only thing we don't want is outright profanity. Most of the workers have been pretty imaginative".

Between music, on-air antics have ranged from trivia games to sexism feuds between the station and Southwest females ("Strictly to get people hepped up and listening," said Buck).

WSW lacks equipment. They do not have a mixing board and could use a couple of amplifiers, a decent second turntable, and more extension cords. One turntable was formally a Sylvan pottery wheel which was carted down to Southwest. The station's antenna is a jumble of coat hangers strung out a fifth floor window. "On a good day, we can reach Orchard Hill," said Minotti.

The station's record library is pretty skimpy. Jockeys have to provide their own music. Relying on worker ingenuity and a growing audience, WSW is "making do" just the same.

Timberlane school board to ponder teacher strike

By JONATHAN KELLOGG
Associated Press Writer

CONCORD, N.H. (AP) — The Timberlane Regional School Board was to meet Wednesday night to ponder the state Supreme Court's refusal to grant an injunction ending a five-week-old strike by the district's teachers.

Earlier in the day, the high court unanimously upheld an opinion by the Rockingham County Superior Court that both parties had not exhausted the possibilities of finding a compromise through collective bargaining.

One hundred of the district's 150 teachers have been on strike since Feb. 26, in an attempt to force the school board to accept a contract which would guarantee binding arbitration in future disputes.

E. Gene Cote, chairman of the school board, said that the purpose of the injunction was to stop the harassment of substitute teachers by picketing teachers. "But if the court feels harassment is proper, so be it," he said.

In its decision, the court said it was persuaded "that it would be detrimental to the smooth operation of the collective bargaining process to declare that an injunction should automatically be issued where public teachers have gone on strike."

The court noted that it was not making a judgement on the merits of providing public employes with the right to strike or of developing alternative processes to resolve government labor disputes.

However, the court said it considered the injunction "an extraordinary remedy which is only granted under circumstances where a plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law and is likely to suffer irreparable harm."

Sudden fish kill

CHICOPEE, Mass. (AP) — A state water resources official said Wednesday it was doubtful that the source of a sudden fish kill in the Chicopee River Tuesday would be determined.

William A. Doubleday of the state Department of Natural Resources DNR was among DNR officials joining Chicopee Health Department officials in a walking tour of the Chicopee River bank Wednesday after several thousand fish in the river died, many of them leaping out of the stream onto the river bank.

Doubleday said officials were able to trace the kill back to a city-operated pumping station.

However, he said previous experience with river pollutants has been that the city has no records of all outlets tied in to the pumping station and it was unlikely that the source could be determined.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

Persons with Neptune in the Sixth House are more sensitive to drgus than most, have a distinct tendency to nervous disorders and are attracted to work which makes them privileged to secret information. These are the natives who deal with associates considered strange and poetic. Very often, individuals with this horoscopic signature correspond with hospital and institutional authorities. They can attain positions of power, but usually work behind the scenes.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You need not make immediate decision. Circumstances are due to change—and you could change your mind at considerable cost. Know it and wait. Gemini, Sagittarius persons are likely to be involved. Examine various possibilities, prospects. You will comprehend.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Hold back—obtain hint from Aries message. Impulse should be tempered with review of factual information. One who promises money may be sincere but misinformed. Know it and don't count on proverbial pot of gold.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Mate, partner may act in "strange" manner. Key now is to be analytical. Seek reasons. Avoid jumping to conclusions. Be suspicious of contracts. Means check for loopholes. Protect valuables. Someone may want something of value for nothing—from you.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): It might be better to stick close to home base rather than to wander. Temptation is to move, embark on journey. This could prove to be costly, even embarrassing. Check appointments, calls, messages. Element of confusion exists.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Personal possessions should be guarded. You need not be fanatical, but you should take extra precautions against theft. Avoid tendency toward wishful thinking. Young person is enthusiastic but lacks practical experience.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Cycle is such that personality, personal appearance is more important than usual. You can obtain what you want but what you really desire may not be clear. Consult individual in position of authority. A bit of flattery will get you plenty.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Much that occurs could be connected with hospital or special organization. Broaden horizons. Visit one who is temporarily incapacitated. Aries, Libra persons could be involved. Finish rather than begin project.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Stick to what you know. Remain loyal to friend. Threat of withdrawal of finances is empty. Stand tall and you will emerge victorious. New, more independent approach is necessary. Imprint your own style.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Goal is in sight—but you may not recognize it. Aura of mystery surrounds you. Play up to it. Means be glamorous in sense that you keep some secrets. Don't tell all. One who attempts to give you third degree is not worth answering.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Highlight flexibility. Don't feel there is only one way to achieve. Try various methods. Give full rein to intellectual curiosity. Ask questions. You will discover person who has information and is willing to teach and share.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Avoid tendency to accept first offer. Do some personal investigating. Friends may not be seeing situation in light of clarity. Be a self-starter, independent, creative and willing to stand up for basic principles.

Women in California, dreamin' title

By DAVE EIBEL

SACRAMENTO — The UMass womens' gymnastics team started day two of their stay in Paradise, er....Sacramento this morning by doffing their gym leotards and getting into swimsuits to enjoy the heated motel swimming pool.

Coach Virginia Evans was not one of those in the pool as in her position she has little time for pursuits other than gymnastics ones, especially with the Nationals starting on Friday.

The women gymnasts this morning did not seem to be thinking about Friday as they splashed around the pool, and reclined in armchairs being burned by the California sun.

"It's good that the girls have a pool at the motel, said Ms. Evans, "This way they can get exercise and be loose at one and the same time. You wouldn't want them to be too psyched up before the meet."

Comparing things in Sacramento, and the atmosphere at last year's Nationals in Des Moines is like equating heaven and hell.

"Last year in Iowa, they had absolutely nothing to do and they've got to keep busy."

Although it might seem that the women are not thinking enough about the Nationals the opposite is true. Ms. Evans told me that the girls are really tensed up and are extremely confident.

Captain Anne Vexler said that all the girls have the attitude they can win, which to Anne is the only one to have. "If you don't have it, you might as well not even show up," said Vex on the flight in on Tuesday.

Evans is not that happy, however, about having UMass in the first grouping. But the Olympic order of competition vaulting, uneven bars, balance beam, and floor exercises doesn't create any problems. "It's the order we've been using all year, it's the one we're used to, so it's the best one."

There are no seeds per se in the competition, but if there were it would be a tossup between UMass and Southern Illinois University, for the premier seed.

SIU's coach, Herb Vogel is the type of person who demands complete allegiance from his athletes. As Ms. Evans said, "Some like him, some hate him, and some can't even work with him."

He's also a practitioner of psychological warfare. Last year in Des Moines, when UMass edged SIU by .7 points to win the crown, Vogel's women "blew" the beam. He came up to the UMass coach and said, "I'm glad that you of all teams are going to win it," referring to the championship. Looking back Evans said that she really believed he was sincere, but in truth it was just an attempt on Vogel's part to unnerve UMass and give SIU a chance to catch up.

In Virginia's mind the key to the meet's outcome does not lie in performances on beam, floor or the other two events but in overall performance.

"The key to the meet is having all the girls pull off their routings as best they can. That will be the deciding factor."

The Nationals will be held on the campus of California State College at Sacramento in a gym that holds only 2,600 little more than what the Cage held for the Eastern Regional Championships on March 15-16. Tickets for the Nationals are the same price as they were for the Easterns, which does seem strange.

Since gymnastics is big in the west, you'd think that the National Womens' Championships would be held in a bigger gym and perhaps in Los Angeles.

According to the UMass coach, the reason why the meet is not in a bigger gym, and charging more for tickets is a simple one.

"It shows that womens' sports are still not on a par with mens' in some people's minds."

In any event this UMass team has gotten farther in competition than another other one. Even though it has a very small budget. For the women gymnasts it's been blood, toil, sweat and tears...and come Friday hopefully a bed of roses.

Blackhawks talon B's, 6-2

CHICAGO (AP) — Pit Martin scored two goals within 17 seconds and triggered the Chicago Black Hawks to a 6-2 victory over the Boston Bruins Wednesday night in a National Hockey League game.

Boston led 2-0 on goals by Daryl Edestrand and Wayne Cashman until the Hawks' six-goal third period spree. Martin jabbed home a rebound at the :24 mark and bounced back 17 seconds later with the tying goal.

The second goal was Martin's 30th of the season.

Germain Gagnon put Chicago ahead 3-2, taking a goal-mouth pass from Stan Mikita and knocking it by Boston goalie Ross Brooks.

The Hawks then hiked their lead to 6-2 on scored by Doug Jarrett, J.P. Bordeleau and Len Frig.

Lacrossers meet UConn

By MIKE ELLIOTT

The UMass lacrosse team will be attempting to win their first game of the season when they travel to UConn today to meet the Huskies in a game starting at 3 p.m.

Garber's Gorillas started off the 1974 season on the wrong foot by losing to Hofstra University 7-6 on Sunday, but they will set out to avenge that loss today.

"I haven't seen Connecticut play this year," said assistant coach, Roger Farrar "but they did lose to Rutgers (ranked ninth in the country) by a score of 12-3. Connecticut usually gives us a tough game. Last year's game was fairly close until we finally broke it open."

In fact last year's game against Connecticut was fairly close for almost a quarter until UMass poured it on to win by an impressive 11-1 score. Looking over past history, however, the University of Connecticut has yet to beat the Gorillas in a series that has thus far totalled eight games.

As for UMass, they look prepared. Said coach Farrar, "The team has looked very sharp since losing to Hofstra. They were somewhat down psychologically after the loss because most of the guys are from Long Island and they were playing against some of their friends. It was a homecoming for some players. The team also feels as if they are as good as Hofstra and it was disappointing to lose."

"I don't know how the Connecticut team is this year, but our team has looked sharp," said Farrar. "We started off tight against Hofstra but in the second half we played well. John Rutledge played an excellent game in goal. Walter Foley had a good game on defense and Andy Scheffer played well at attack, scoring two goals."

This year's team has excellent depth at all positions. Said coach Farrar, "We have three good goaltenders — John Rutledge, Bobby Durland, and Jim Haddad. Our attack has moved very well so far and there is good depth there also. We have four very good attackmen — Peter Connolly, Jeff Spooner, Harry Mcvey, and Andy Scheffer. We are very strong at the midfield position; we have three rotating midfields which are almost equal. The defense has also played well so far. The starters are Billy Blaustein, Rich Lally, and Russ Incorvia."

Sox end Grapefruit slate on top, 4-3

WINTER HAVEN, Fla. (AP) — Rico Petrocelli belted a game-tying three-run homer and Bernie Carbo singled across the deciding tally Wednesday as the Boston Red Sox ended their exhibition schedule with a 4-3 victory over the Montreal Expos.

The Red Sox, who will play an intrasquad game Thursday before flying to Milwaukee for the start of the American League season, snapped Montreal's eight-game winning streak and finished with an 18-8 record.

Handcuffed for five innings by Steve Renko and Tom Walker, the Red Sox broke loose in the sixth. Cecil Cooper opened with a line single and Carl Yastrzemski walked before Petrocelli unloaded a long shot far over the left field fence for his third spring homer.

John Mantague, the third Montreal pitcher, got himself into trouble in the eighth. He walked Cooper, but Rick Miller bunted into a force play. Montague then threw wildly on a pickoff attempt and Carbo drilled a run-scoring single to center.

Boston started Rogelio Moret who was nicked for a run in the first on a walk, an infield out and Ken Singleton's single. The Expos, 12-11, added two more runs off Dick Drago in the sixth, Bob Bailey and Jim Cox singling home the tallies.

Veteran Reliever Diego Segui blanked the Expos in the final three innings.

Pitching staff strong suit

Mets picked to take mediocre NL East

(Editor's Note: This is the second part of a four part series in which Collegian Columnist Bob Estelle examines the major league baseball teams.)

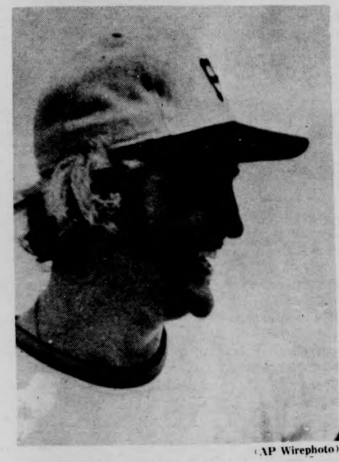
The five teams challenging the New York Mets for the N.L. East title went to the market and made some trades, but still came out short of the Mets. The Cardinals gave up too much pitching, the Pirates don't have enough pitching, the Phillies and Expos aren't ready yet and the Cubs got ripped off. For a further look into why the Mets will win again, look at the summaries.

NEW YORK METS (1ST)

The Mets stayed pat with their 1973 pennant winners as manager Yogi Berra didn't want to give up his pitching. The main Met problem is finding a centerfielder. Berra plans on putting Dave Schneck or Don Hahn there. Cleon Jones, a perennial problem child, is in left field. Rusty Staub figures to have a better year in right field.

The infield is set with John Milner at first, Felix Millan at second, Buddy Harrelson at short and Wayne Garrett at third. Jerry Grote and Ron Hodges will share the catching duties.

The rest of the National League is envious at the Met pitching staff. "Cy Young" Tom Seaver, Jon Matlack, Jerry Koosman, George Stone and Tug McGraw make up the backbone of the staff. Harry Parker, Ray Sadecki, Bob Miller and rookies Bob Apodaca (6-3, 1.80ERA) and Greg Swan (7-5, 2.34 ERA) will fight for the other jobs. That's some staff! Now let the Mets stay free of injuries! If they do, that 82-79 will improve.



(AP Wirephoto)

EX-RED SOXER Ken Brett hurls for the pirates this year, a team that should content for the N.L. East flag.

PITTSBURGH PIRATES (2ND)

Against the advice of his doctors, Danny Murtaugh has once again become the Pirate manager. He has new personnel in pitchers Ken Brett and Jerry Reuss; catcher-outfielder Ed Kirkpatrick and infielder Kurt Bevacqua.

Brett, Reuss, Steve Blass and Dock Ellis figure to lead the mound core. Dave Giusti and Ramon Hernandez run the bullpen. Kirkpatrick backs up Manny Sanguillen behind the plate. Bob Robertson, Rennie Stennett, Jackie Hernandez and Richie Hebner play a decent and consistent infield but Gene Alley's retirement will hurt. Willie Stargell, Gene Clines, Al Oliver and Richie Zisk are the outfielders. It isn't bad, but the Pirates just aren't as good as they were a few years back.

MONTREAL EXPOS (3RD)

The Expos made a big move last winter in swapping ace fireman Mike Marshall to Los Angeles for Willie Davis. This puts forward a big question: can the loss of Marshall (14-11, 2.66 ERA and 31 saves) be made up by a 33 year old centerfielder who has seen better days? To a small degree, maybe. The Expos are getting better every year. The mound staff starts off with Steve Rogers, Steve Renko, Balor Moore and MIke Torrez. Beyond that, there are problems. There is no bullpen now that Marshall is gone.

Barry Foote and Terry Humphrey are the catchers. Hal Breeden and Ron Fairly share first base, an aging Ron Hunt is at third, Tim Foli is at short and rookie Jim Cox is at second. Davis, Ken Singleton and Ron Fairly are the outfielders.

The Expos will win their share of games but they are not serious contenders, not just yet.

PHILADELPHIA PHILLIES (4TH)

This is the most improved team in baseball. If the pitching gets better, they should finally get out of the cellar.

Steve Carlton should have a good year, Jim Lonborg is another decent starter, Wayne Twitchell is another workhorse who gets better every year and Dick Ruthven is young and learning. The bullpen is anchored by Mac Scarce, George Culver and Eddie Watt. Bob Boone is the catcher, Willie Montanez is the first baseman, Dave Cash and Larry Bowa should be a good double play combination and Bill Grabarkewitz handles third base.

The Phillies strength is in the outfield. Del Unser, Greg Luzinski, Mike Anderson and Bill Robinson are all good enough to show the world that the Phillies are finally headed in the right direction.

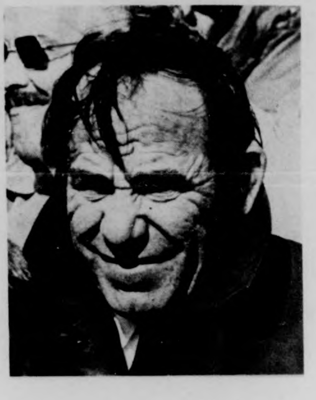
ST. LOUIS CARDINALS (5TH)

Gussie Busch wrecked his ballclub last winter by trading away too much pitching. Reggie Cleveland and Rick Wise are now in Boston and there are no real replacements. Bob Gibson is 38 and is coming off a knee injury. The rest of the staff is too shaky to even talk about.

Ted Simmons is a good catcher, Joe Torre is a decent first baseman, Ted Sizemore is respectable at second, Mike Tyson is a good, young prospect at short as is third sacker Ken Reitz.

Lou Brock is good, but is aging. Reggie Smith is a decent centerfielder who should do well. Jose Cruz, Luis Melendez, Jim Dwyer or Bake McBride will be the right-fielder.

The Redbirds have a run scoring potential but the poor mound core will hurt too much.



(Staff Photo-Mike Kneeland)

TIM BERRA'S FATHER should have a lot to smile about this year.

CHICAGO CUBS (6TH)

By trading away Fergie Jenkins, Glenn Beckert, Randy Hundley and Ron Santo, the Cubs have a guaranteed cellar awaiting them. They received next to nothing in those trades.

With Jenkins gone, Burt Hooton, Rick Reuschel, Bill Bonham and Scipio Spinks will be the starters. Dave LaRoche and Haracio Pina run the bullpen. Newly acquired George Mitterwald will catch. The infield is mediocre and aging. Billy Williams is the first baseman. Vic Harris is at second, Don Kessinger is at short and Bill Madlock is at third. A possibility is that Gonzalo Marquez, the hero of the 1972 American League Playoffs, will win the first base job.

The outfield is strong with Jose Cardenal, Jerry Morales and Rick Monday starting but the depth isn't there. In short, the Cubs are in for a long summer.

(Tomorrow: American League West.)

Rugby team defeats BC, evens record

By R. L. LAURENCE

The athletic rivalry between UMass and Boston College will continue for a long time, but the Minuteman ruggers have shown the Eagles what good college rugby can be. Last weekend, UMass Rugby Club took two games from B.C. at Chestnut Hill. The UMass first XV dominated play throughout the game and came through with a 9-3 win. The game was not all roses.

Playing in sleet, the Minutemen, led by Dan Georgianna and Jim Tkacik controlled play in the first half, but were not able to finish the many scoring thrusts B.C. presented them. Early in the second half, B.C. scored a long penalty kick to go ahead 3-0. Despite the continued control of the game, UMass could not score. Brian Kain, after four unsuccessful attempts during the game, finally made good on a penalty kick to tie the score. Minutes later, Craig Lovell made a break in the centers, passing to Rick Lopes, who set up a long run by freshman Jay Appleman. The young winger went out of bounds just yards from the try line, but on the following line out, Captain Paul Greenfield pounced on the free ball for the score. Kain converted. UMass kept the lead and won 9-3.

The second XV showed the same domination over B.C. in winning 9-4. Jack Sheehan scored following good defensive play by the Umass pack. Al Solish converted and later added a penalty kick.

The ruggers record now stands at 1-1, having lost the opener at Providence on March 23. The huge Providence forwards dominated play to carry their lead at halftime to 9-0. UMass fought back on a penalty kick by Kain and a beautiful converted try by Georgianna. Providence won on a penalty in the waning minutes 12-9. UMass B and C sides did not fare well dropping 11-0 and 14-0 games to Providence RFC.

This week the ruggers take on Harvard Business in three games on Saturday. The games, slated to start at 12:30, are to be played on the UMass fields west of Boyden.

UMass gymnastics weekend

Injured Whelan shoots for NCAA championship

By WALT POWERS

Gene Whelan's dreams of winning an NCAA gymnastics title nearly evaporated two weeks ago when he tore his bicep in practice, but after an amazing recovery, his chances in this weekend's championship meet just could be better.

Before the injury, Whelan, the Eastern League all-around champ, was the pre-meet favorite to finish in second place. The injury will not help him on his routines, but as Tom Dunn pointed out, the injury "has taken the pressure off Gene, and made him more prepared."

Whelan became only the third UMass qualifier for the Nationals when he won the all-around, and parallel bars, and finished second on floor, still rings and high bar at the Eastern League Championships. He's the first UMass gymnast to qualify for more than one event and hopes to become their second All-American. Jay Aronstein became UMass' first All-American last year when he finished third on the still rings.

The competition Whelan will face is strong, and even his best performance is likely to result in only a second place all-around finish. The torn bicep has limited him to simpler routines in the high bar and pommel horse, and his best bet is on the parallel bars, an event he won at the Easterns.

Steve Hug is everybody's favorite to win the all-around. A two-time Olympian from Stanford, Hug is shooting for his third straight championship. It's a dogfight after that, and the strongest competition could easily come from Gene's twin brother Jay, the Eastern League runnerup and winner of the NCAA college-division title last week.

Whelan is the only UMass participant in this meet, a three day affair held at Penn State. In the team championships, it looks like an open frolic for the midwest, even though Eastern champ Penn State could well make a run for it goaded by their home crowd.

Iowa State, Iowa, and Indiana State have run up the highest scores of the season, and even though their conferences are overscored, figure to battle for the title. Penn State was runnerup last year, but they haven't improved. Ostensibly they take their championship attempt seriously, but UMass coach Tom Dunn, an alumnus, doubts they can win.

"I really think Penn State is praying to make the top three", he said. "I don't think they care where they place."

Women gymnasts compete Friday for national title

By DAVE EIBEL

SACRAMENTO — The UMass Women's Gymnastic Team arrived in Sacramento Tuesday night after a cross-country jet flight on a cramped Boeing 727. About the only positive part of the trip was the good luck wishes given the team by the plane's Captain soon after leaving Bradley Airport.

The National Women's Gymnastics Championships open Friday afternoon at 1:30 P.D.T. at California State College in Sacramento. The luck of the draw, or lack of luck, has UMass in the first grouping.

Being one of the first teams has advantages and disadvantages. Gymnastics judges take a while to get used to competitors and establish a basis for scoring all the competitors. On one hand UMass might be scored lower than they might be if they were in a later grouping, but more likely, UMass would be marked fairly high because they are defending National champions.

But going first has the advantage of letting UMass go through its routines without any extra pressure that might be on them if they competed in one of the later groupings. Captain Anne Vexler said, "I'd rather go first than feel that we have to score a certain amount to win. There's a lot less pressure on us if we go first." Assistant Coach Mike Kasavana concurred with "Ms. Vex" feeling that the pressure will be less on UMass this way. "The pressure will be on the teams that go after us. If they have one or two breaks in their routines, they'll be finished."

Springfield and Southern Illinois University will be UMass' two chief worries in the competition. While UMass won the Eastern Regionals with a score of 106.30 the highest score ever in that competition, SIU won their regionals with a score of 108. But according to Kasavana, that means very little. "Judges around the country will score differently," he said, "and with the judges for the Nationals coming from all over the country, there shouldn't be any discrepancies in scoring."

Steve Smith, Collegian photographer took ages to recognize Ann Vexler when she stood right in front of him prior to departure at Bradley Airport. It seems that it's a difficult thing to recognize a gymnast when she's not in her gym outfit and in regular clothes. But still, a journalist should be able to recognize faces.

SACRAMENTO NOTEBOOK... Springfield flew in a day before UMass, obviously very intent on getting any edge they can over their arch-rivals from Amherst...tickets for the Nationals are same as the tickets were for the Easterns held at the Cage...hate to mention it but it was 75 degrees and sunny when we arrived...Although Jeannine Burger had ankle problems which caused her to miss a week of practice, she's 100 per cent now along with everyone else...and if our cruising altitute between Chicago and Sacramento was 39,000 feet, the women gymnasts are even higher for the Championships...

Celts buffalo Braves, 120-107 Jump to 2-1 series lead

BOSTON (AP) — John Havlicek, Dave Cowens and the Celtics stunned Buffalo with a 39 point first quarter and Boston romped to a 120-107 victory over the Braves to take a 2-1 lead in their best-of-seven National Basketball Association play-off series Wednesday night.

The Celtics, who had fallen far behind in the early moments of the first two games, made sure it was not going to happen again by running up a 39-22 first period lead as Cowens fired 13 points, Havlicek 12 and Don Chaney 10.

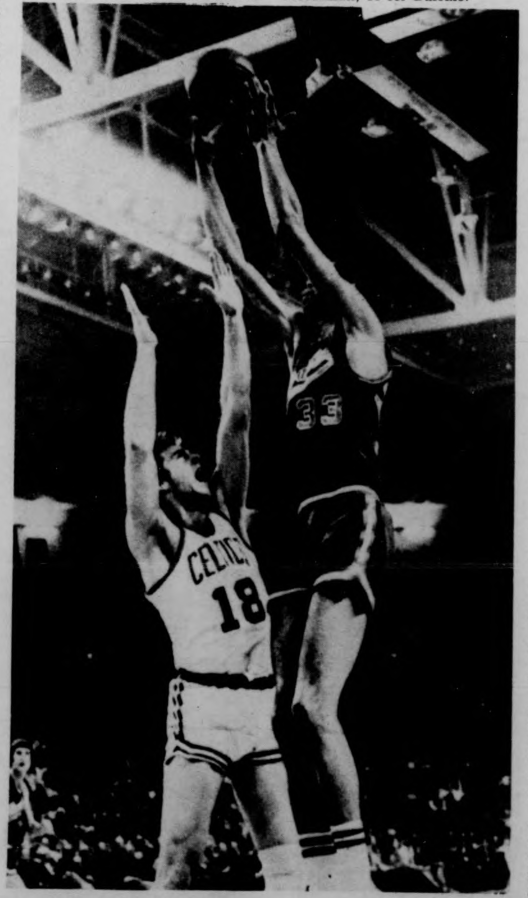
The score was tied 14-14 at the six-minute mark when the Celtics made their move, scoring 13 straight points in a string that included two baskets each by Cowens, Havlicek and Chaney and steals by Cowens and Havlicek.

Havlicek's hot shooting continued into the second period as he accounted for 14 more points in moving the Celtics out to a 62-39 lead before the Braves' Bob McAdoo's run of 10 points helped trim the margin to 66-53 at the half.

Buffalo whittled the lead to 72-63 three minutes into the second half as Jim McMillian threw in three baskets in an early third-quarter surge.

But Boston put on another burst of 13 points to four for the Braves, who never threatened again.

Havlicek's 43 points led all scorers. Cowens had 23 and Chaney 17 for the Celtics. McAdoo fired in 38, Garfield Heard 18 and McMillian, 16 for Buffalo.



DAVE COWENS scored 23 in last night's win, and in so doing got one step closer to a possible showdown against Kareem Abdul-Jabbar, whose team is also ahead in their playoff series.

Who needs DH rule?

Spring is here. The sun is out, and the baseball season begins anew. This will be the second year for a bold experiment — the designated hitter. I have been talking to a certain pitcher recently whose name must remain anonymous. The subject of our talk has been the DH.

"Do you like the idea of not being able to bat in a game you're pitching?" I asked. "Not at all," was his reply. "Do you feel that you are capable of hitting as well as (if not better) than non-pitchers on the current team?" "Yes, certainly," was the response.

By now we're all familiar with what the designated hitter has done for those who wore that label in 1973. It prolonged the careers of players who otherwise would have had to find a different job. The DH was designed as a "three-year experiment" in the American League only, so the Sox signed Orlando Cepeda to a three year contract. He was cut last week because our grandmothers could run around the bases faster (and demand less money too).

If the National League eventually decides to adopt the rule, the young ball player with all the skills — hitting, hitting with power, running, fielding, and throwing — is doomed to extinction. Some pitchers are victims and don't like it because they can hit. Jim Palmer, Jim Hunter, and Rick Wise are three who despise the rule because they've hit their share of home runs. The American League team was not supposed to win the World Series last year, claimed the critics, because the pitchers would have to bat. I didn't even notice that the DH was missing from the offensive platoon. And it was a well-played seven game World Series with the A's, the AL team, winning.

Eight pitchers went to bat in the AL during the regular season last year. This occurs when the DH who starts the game replaces somebody in the field. Once a DH goes on defense, no other teammate can be used in the DH position. When this happens the pitcher bats in the position of the player who was removed from the defensive platoon whom the DH replaced. Now that we all understand that, let's take a case in point.

Last June when the first AL pitcher came to the plate, a national magazine and newspapers all over the country had a major story. Cy Acosta of the White Sox went to a friend on the team, asked if he could please borrow a bat, did the same to try and find a helmet to fit, and promptly walked up to the batter's box amidst a standing ovation. And then struck out on three pitches. With a little more hitting practice, he could have done better. And for you trivia freaks, Chris Short of the Milwaukee Brewers was the first pitcher to reach base last season on a catcher's interference call by the home-plate umpire.

According to statistics when any batter takes his stance at the plate, either he gets a hit or he doesn't. The odds are therefore 50-50. But the manager wants someone with a .300 batting average up there taking his cuts. What is a .300 average? It's someone who, for every trip to the batter's box, doesn't get a hit seven times. Now if Bob Griese missed seven out of every ten passes he threw for the Miami Dolphins, he probably would find himself sitting on the bench.

The DH is being introduced in the colleges this year. But I often wonder why everyone who knows anything about baseball says the National League is more exciting than the American. For one thing there is more bunting. The pitchers do most of it — a strategic move to help push a runner along into scoring position. The pitchers enjoy taking their cuts and helping themselves win ballgames. A couple of years ago, Sonny Siebert shut out the Baltimore Orioles 3-0 in Fenway Park. He knocked in all the runs himself — on two homers.

Even though I don't mind seeing players who were almost finished limp around the bases, I think we can do away with the designated hitter rule. And I hope the pitcher I talked to gets a chance to bat this year.

Most students politically unaware

UMass may be an ideal place for the candidates for Governor to campaign this spring.

A poll released this week by Project Pulse indicates that nearly half of the UMass students do not consider themselves politically aware of the issues and candidates involved in November's election.

The survey also turned up these facts:

—57.8 per cent are not committed to any candidate.

—65.2 per cent have no particular party affiliation

—54.8 per cent are generally concerned with political activities in their home towns.

—47.4 per cent have no opinion of Gov. Sargent's reorganization plan for higher education.

—Western Massachusetts students are more critical of the Sargent administration than students from the eastern section of the state—but seem to have less opinion on general issues.

PULSE conducted an opinion survey of UMass undergraduates and graduates March 12 in order to gauge student awareness of candidates and issues in the race for Governor.

Of the student population of more than 20,000, 135 students were randomly selected and question. The sample included 121 eligible voters in Massachusetts—95 who are registered.

For any given percentage figure reported on a given question in the sample total PULSE listed a possible error range of eight points plus or minus.

Although 47.4 per cent of the sample indicated general satisfaction with the Sargent administration, only 17 per cent said they supported his re-election.

The popularity of other candidates:

Michael Dukakis	11.9 per cent
Atty Gen. Robert Quinn	4.4 per cent
Peter Fuller	.7 per cent
Carroll Sheehan	.0 per cent
none of these	8.1 per cent
undecided	57.8 per cent
Party affiliation:
Democrat	19.3 per cent
Independent	12.6 per cent
Republican	3.0 per cent
None	65.2 per cent

Lack of student political awareness was most apparent when students were questioned about the Sargent administration's effectiveness in providing sufficient financial aid to students and the Governor's proposed reorganization for higher education.

Nearly 30 per cent of the students did not know whether the Governor was providing adequate funds; over 53 per cent had no opinion or were unfamiliar with educational reorganization—which the Collegian has reported on frequently.

While over 50 per cent of the students said they felt Watergate has caused them to view state politics more skeptically than before, 35.8 per cent had no opinion when asked whether Massachusetts needed major reforms in regards to the financing of state elections and campaigns.

Over 53 per cent said the state needs major campaign and election reforms—93 per cent said political candidates should make their campaign expenditures public.

Only 13 per cent blamed the low supplies of fuel and gas in Massachusetts on the Sargent administration's inability to deal with the Federal Energy Office—50.4 per cent accused the Nixon administration of discrimination.

Sargent's popularity among Eastern Massachusetts was recorded at 23 per cent compared to 9 per cent among Western Massachusetts students. Over 53 per cent of the students from Eastern Massachusetts expressed a general satisfaction with the Governor's policies.

A majority of Western Massachusetts students—who constituted 24.4 per cent of the sample—had no opinion when asked whether Sargent had done enough to eliminate political patronage and promote the area of human services.

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — If any part of the U.S. becomes a Sweden, it'll be California.

There are many resemblances between them even if they are separated by 7,000 miles.

The predominant hair color among women here is blond, just as in Scandinavia. It's probably the sun shining differently than it does in the east. It smothers you with warmth in sort of solar asphyxiation, as its rays bathe you from head to foot.

Commentary

California is more than sun, sand and bright lights — it is a very permissive society, socially and sexually, outwardly at least.

People are courteous to the point of being forward. No request is too much of an imporition. If you place a phone call, you either get an answer on the phone, or are called back with alarming celerity. There's none of the run-around business that some of us are so used to at UMass. Switching you from office to office and from putting you on hold is considered a waste of your time and the other party's. If the demeanor of a person depends on his environment, it's closer that California sunshine causes California sweetness. We've just been overwhelmed with our reception out here.

Permissiveness in California tends on the extreme.

One finds newspaper vending machines on almost every corner which sell, as one would expect, the local "respectable" papers like the Sacramento Bee, the Sacramento Union, and the San Francisco papers like the Examiner and the Chronicle.

But side by side with the boxes holding those papers stand machines which dispense the Bay Area Guardian, Berkeley Barb, Los Angeles Free Press, the most widely-circulated underground newspapers in California.

Still the list is not complete. On the same corner that you can buy the Examiner, you can deposit 50 cents into a vending machine buy Singles' Critique, Swinger, and various newspapers catering to the "swapping" crowd.

The Barb is the Underground peper of the northwest, but it is more than just a collection of reports on the news from the "other point of view." It is full of ads for massage parlors, personal "services", nude encounter groups, and swingers' clubs. Looking at the paper, one would think that Berkeley is a modern Sodom and Gomorrah, where every erotic fantasy can be catered to.

Sacramento, the capital of the State of California, offers an intriguing antithesis.

Bromery tells faculty:

UMass could lose $4.3 million in budget cuts

By SUSAN R. HUBBARD
MDC Staff

A 6½ percent budget cut as proposed by Governor Francis W. Sargent could mean the loss of $4.3 million to the University, stated Chancellor Randolph W. Bromery as he addressed yesterday's meeting of the Faculty Senate.

Besides budget abbreviations, other topics of discussion by the senators included sales of the Daily Collegian, library book thefts, liability insurance for teachers, and semester student exchanges.

In a letter to the governor, Bromery said, "Such budget cuts would cause irreparable damage to the academic community.

"I ask that institutions of higher learning be exempt from budget cuts," Bromery concluded.

With inflation soaring above expected rates, the Chancellor said, "A 6½ cut may mean the University would get less than 90 percent of its desired budget."

While the rules were suspended, the Fac-Sen voted to add their endorsement to the Bromery letter.

Nick Apostola, SGA President, then addressed the meeting stating that the undergraduate senate approves of the sale of the Daily Collegian to non-undergraduates and the prosecution of those who violate this rule.

The Library Committee, in their annual report said that as many as 5 percent of the books in the University's possession are stolen or 'lost' annually according to recent spot checks.

An exact figure for this loss cannot be established until a full inventory is completed.

Under consideration is the purchase of electronic devices to discourage theft of library books.

A motion by the Rules Committee called for endorsement of a state senate bill in which liability insurance for Massachusetts employees, including teachers, would become the responsibility of the state.

Although the Fac-Sen was not in possession of an exact copy of the bill, the motion for endorsement passed.

A study into one semester exchanges between the Boston and Amherst campuses of the University was proposed by the Admissions and Records Committee.

Over the past year, more than 200 students from the Boston campus have requested to come to UMass-Amherst.

The Fac-Sen meeting was then recessed until 4:00 p.m. next Thursday.

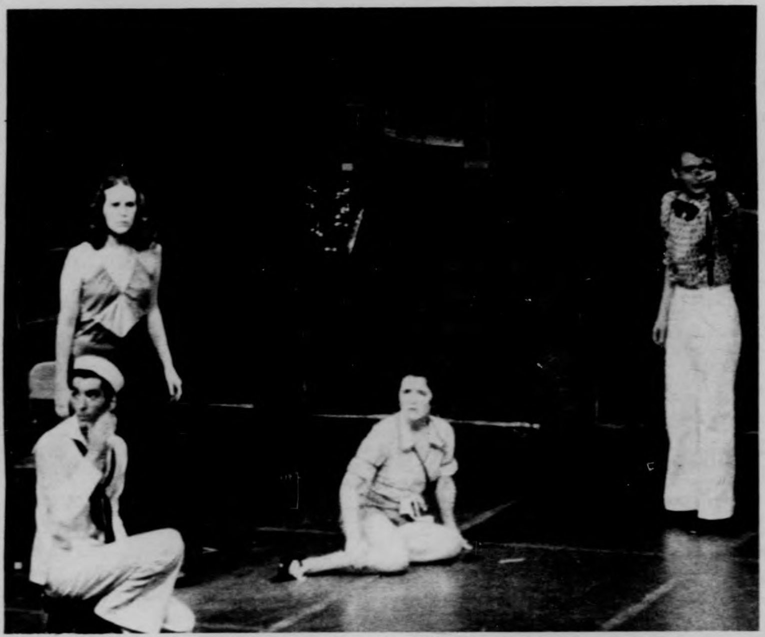
Dames At Sea: entertaining nostalgia trip



By DOROTHY L. MULLER
MDC Fine Arts Reporter

How does a simple girl from Centerville, U.S.A. become the toast of broadway and the sweetheart of the U.S. Navy? She weighs anchor and shoves off for New York to tap dance her way to stardom in a musical comedy awash with able-bodied seawomen.

Dames at Sea, presented by the UMass Music Theatre Guild, tonight through Saturday, is a voyage in 1930's musical nostalgia. It is alight comedy about a sweet little puckered up thing from Centerville, Utah who meets the song-writing sailor who first bought an eskimo pie in her father's drug store. Dick as an amateur composer is a man of no mean talent at least according to Mona Kent, a seductive French actress whose language is sprinkled with "mon cher", and whose real name is Grace Topoloski from Flatbrush.

Ruby, the innocent little "Miss" from Utah, is taken under the motherly wing of Joan, a chorus girl in the musical, who knows that Broadway is nothing but "broken hopes and worn out dreams, not to mention worn out feet." Just coincidentally, Joan meets Lucky, the wayward sailor who remembers their wonderful nights of "cooin' and cuddlin'" but who is adamantly opposed to marriage. Riding herd over this flock of chorus cuties is their harried stagemanager, Hennessey whose wife game him a choice. "It's either the show or me!" Naturally what choice does a real trooper have?

Ruby, played by Mary Scoledge on Wednesday night, is a rich soprano with a slight tremulo, reminiscent of the sweet female of the Hollywood musical extravaganzas.

Mona Kent, played by Luann Barry, seems uncomfortably aware of her movements. While waiting for her cues she falls rapidly in and out of character. As the French actress she is suitably effective but something less than convincing.

Steven Rourke as the harried stage manager, opens with a strong Jewish accent but forgets and often loses it at intervals. His characterization is strong but his projection is weak. Carolyn F. Schade, as Joan has developed a robust, strong characterization with singular stage presence. It is her charcterization which maintains the momentum of the show.

Mike O'Neil's staging makes excellent use of canvass flats in set design on a limited budget. In addition, the silhouette of the three mimes is very sophisticated especially for musical comedy.

Overall, Dames at Sea is a wonderfully entertaining nostalgia trip, a good college production but far from outstanding.

CC no longer supports SW Rathskeller

By STEVE TETREAULT

The Campus Center is discontinuing negotiations with the Southwest Assembly over the proposed operation of a Rathskeller in Hampden Dining Commons, it was learned yesterday.

In a recent memorandum, John W. Corker, Campus Center Director stated to James Lindsey, Director of the CC Board of Governors, "I can no longer give support to the proposal and feel the Campus Center should withdraw any consideration of opening up a Rathskeller in Southwest."

Corker gave several reasons for his stand, among them that original cost estimates regarding labor and supplies were too low; that the Campus Center's first priority should be the straightening out of affairs within the Campus Center; that the environment of the situation is not conducive towards the opening of a nightspot, that is any problems arising out of the Rathskeller might be blamed on the Campus Center; and that there would be continued conflict between the Campus Center and the Southwest Assembly over certain agreements made by the parties.

As a result of this communication, Lindsey sent a memorandum to Larry St. Cyr, stating that the Campus Center understood the constraints being put upon them by Southwest were results of efforts to create a better community, but these constraints were not conducive to a sound financial operation.

UFW VP here today

Delores Huerta, the New York City coordinator and national vice-president of the United Farm Workers (UFW), will speak this afternoon in the Student Ballroom at 2:30.

Ms. Huerta's appearance at the Ballroom rally was organized by the Western Massachusetts Boycott committee, and is to be an initial rally to gather forces for a mass picket of the Northampton A & P branch at five this afternoon, according to a committee spokesperson.

The boycott committee in Western Massachusetts, which includes a contingent of UMass students, is trying to force A & P and other independent supermarket chains to stop carrying non-UFW picked and grown lettuce, wine or grapes.

Ms. Huerta's appearance is sponsored by the Distinguished Visitors' Program which put up $200 for her visit. The money will go into a UFW strike fund.

BDIC catching on

BDIC. It's not an acronym like HUD (Housing and Urban Development), or NOW (National Organization for Women). In fact, you can't even pronounce BDIC. You have to spell it out.

Still, it's catching on at UMass. BDIC stands for Bachelor's Degree with Individual Concentration, and that means a lot to the approximately 400 students who call it their major.

To Peter DiGiammarino of Lexington it means a triple area of study — computer science, econmics, and math. To Peter Urbanski of Danvers it means studying something called "secondary environmental education and natural history."

For 398 other BDIC students as well, those initials mean majors they've created with the help of faculty members, because their special career interests do not fit any regular UMass department. With BDIC they can study "dance therapy," "sociopsychological aspects of marketing, hotel, and restaurant services," "gerontology," "underwater education," "sociological perspectives of law," "intellectual evolution of man and his search for the appropriate cultural vehicles," and a multitude of others. When the BDIC faculty committee in charge notices several students whose interests are similar, new UMass majors are born — such as legal studies, religious studies, and political thought and social economy. BDIC Director Stanley M. Moss expects the same to happen to computer science, women's studies, and human services.

Since 1970 BDIC has been giving UMass undergraduates the opportunity to design their own programs as alternatives to standard ones. BDIC began as an experiment and in 1972 was made a permanent part of the curriculum.

Commercial, handicraft wares compete on concourse

By ROBERTA MARTONE
MDC Staff

What's the difference between a commercially made item sold for profit, and a handicraft item? If you've ever sold anything on the Campus Center concourse level, you should know the answer. Denny Matteau and Kris Jackson found out the hard way.

According to Ms. Matteau, this past summer, she and Jackson established their own silk-printing press. They were planning on silk-printing T-shirts with original designs. This spring they decided to print the BVD's with streaker mottos and designs.

During March, Matteau and Jackson attempted to sell their wares on the concourse level. But the University Store manager, Win Cummings, prohibited the sale of the shirts on the concourse level because of competition with the store's merchandise, Ms. Matteau said.

"The manager told us we couldn't sell a commercially made item for profit, if it was sold by the store.", she continued.

Matteau argued that the T-shirts were the "same as the belts sold at the tables. They're items bought and changed through craftsman procedures."

She said she "didn't think it was fair" that the Pre-Vet society, who bought some of the silk-screen shirts, were able to sell the shirts on the concourse level because they were a non-profit club.

Because Matteau and Jackson were making the designs, but not the T-shirts, the manager said it was a violation of the rules.

Seeking to overcome these obstacles, Matteau and Jackson moved their wares to the Student Union Building. Cummings said the same rules that applied to the Campus Center concourse also applied to the Student Union.

"Wilkes, (who is affiliated with the University Store), did give us a waiver for the day. He let us finish our selling for the day, and we didn't have to pay the five dollar fee they charge per half day.", said Matteau.

Matteau said the manager understood their problem and told them to appeal to Mike Curran of the SUG Board. After several attempts to attend the meetings that were either cancelled or changed, Matteau and Jackson sent in a written appeal.

Mike Curran suggested a compromise. He agreed to let Matteau and Jackson sell their shirts if they bought them from the University Store. According to Matteau, the University Store said they would sell the shirts to them for less than retail, (approximately $.80 to $.85 a piece). Matteau and Jackson maintained they could buy the shirts for less.

Cummings suggested Matteau and Jackson sell the shirts through the University Store. "We were afraid they would raise the prices if we sold our shirts through the store. At first we were selling them for $3.00, then $2.00. We finally settled on $2.50. I didn't want to charge a price I wouldn't pay for. It's not fair to the students."

The University Store finally agreed to pay Matteau and Jackson $1.95 for each shirt, while selling them at "$2.95 a piece.

Jackson said that they had overcome the problem for the present. But, he said, there would probably be complications about selling other items in the future. Since he and Matteau were only the second "incident", he felt that sooner or later other students would be faced with the same problem.

In the future, Matteau and Jackson hope to build a business doing individual orders, while also selling their shirts through the University Store.

Prof. Hoffman:

NU 'buying their way' into Montague

UMass professor of physics Allan R. Hoffman said yesterday that Northeast Utilities (NU) plan to build twin 850 megawatts nuclear power plants in Montague, ten miles north of here was made because the area is "economically depressed."

Answering a question as the featured speaker at a seminar yesterday in the Colonial Lounge, Hoffman said NU is "buying their way into the community" because "people respond to short-term economic incentive."

Critics of the proposal believe that Montague residents are attracted to the power plants proposal because their tax rate would drop to almost nothing when NU begins paying taxes on the multi-million dollar development.

Hoffman also told a noontime audience there is "maybe" a 20 year supply of uranium left to supply current and projected fission nuclear reactors. But he advised against shutting down nuclear plants outright because the economic cost of producing needed electricity by other sources would be too great.

Hoffman also cited radiation danger from nuclear plants, as well as the common medical X-ray machine. "We exist in a sea of radiation but in amounts not dangerous at the present time," the physics professor and nuclear expert said.

Hoffman said doctors use X-ray excessively because they're afraid of malpractice suits resulting from inadequate diagnosis if they don't.

"Right now, I would very strongly advocate people becoming involved with the indescriminate medical use of radiation," he said.

He said nuclear power plants are not inherently dangerous because radiation levels in normal operation is minimal and within AEC standards. But he said he agreed with an assessment by Ralph Nader that the "human risk factor" in plant operation is sufficiently great to make the possibility of a catastrophic killing radiation leak from a reactor malfunction higher than should be tolerated.

Correction

Last Tuesday, the Collegian incorrectly stated that all tenants currently living in University and Lincoln apartments would be subject to a 40 to 50 dollar rent increase. The new rates, effective after April 1, apply only to new tenants leasing after that date. Tenants leasing apartments prior to April 1, will pay 8 to 25 dollars more.

Five states called disaster areas

Tornadoes kill 329; thousands injured

Rescue workers counted the dead yesterday and tried to help the living rebuild after the nation's worst tornado disaster in 49 years left at least 329 dead and thousands injured or homeless. President Nixon declared five states federal disaster areas.

"The destruction, the devastation is unbelievable," said Vice President Gerald R. Ford after flying over damaged areas of Ohio. "You can see where the houses were reduced to matches."

The tornadoes and related storms that struck late Wednesday and early yesterday hit 11 Southern and Midwestern states and Ontario, Canada. Whole communities were turned into piles of rubble; more than 30 buildings at the Army's Redstone Arsenal near Huntsville, Ala., were destroyed or damaged.

High winds and flooding continued in the tornadoes' aftermath. A Virginia teenager was killed Thursday when his mobile home was picked up by the wind, hurled 100 yards and dropped on its top.

Acting in response to pleas from state officials, Nixon declared Alabama, Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana and Tennessee diaster areas, making them eligible for massive federal aid. Deputy Press Secretary Gerald Warren said, "It's quite likely there will be other disaster declarations later."

The National Weather Service issued new tornado watches for parts of nine states. But forecasters said the conditions Thursday were not the same as those that produced the earlier storms.

Officials in Ohio reported 35 dead from the storms; Kentucky had 80 dead, Alabama 72, Indiana 62, Tennessee 54, Georgia 15, Ontario, Canada, 8, North Carolina 5, Michigan 3, Illinois 2, Virginia, 1 and West Virginia 1.

It was virtually impossible to come up with an accurate tally of the damage which was high in the millions. Sen. Birch E. Bayh, D-Ind., proposed that the federal disaster fund be boosted by $100 million. He said all but $63 million of the $400 million appropriated this year has been committed.

Survivors of the storms' wrath mourned lost friends and tried to figure out what happened. "I don't believe it" said Don Hilton of Xenia, a town of 25,000 in southwestern Ohio.

Bill O'Brien, an insurance adjuster in town to help his clients, said, "This is one of the worst tornadoes I have seen in my 18 years in the business." Officials in Xenia said they couldn't even find a place for O'Brien to set up headquarters. "Most all of our buildings are down," explained the mayor.

By midafternoon, 28 were confirmed dead and officials said there could be more bodies in the debris. A curfew was imposed to prevent looting.

The list of injured grew. "We have 350 at this point and another 300 and some odd have been treated elsewhere," said a spokesman at one hospital. "That's 650 and they're still coming in."

Authorities moved slowly along debris-clogged roads, hunting for victims buried in the shambles of what had been homes and businesses. Power lines were knocked down; telephones were out; essential services cut off.

Central State University in Xenia was closed until further notice because of the storms; a Baptist minister in Jasper, Ala., died when a tornado struck the church as he was conducting the weekly prayer service.

The Tennessee Valley Authority said the utility suffered the worst damage in its 40-year history. "Even when we get power restored on our lines there will still be a lot of damage and outages on local power distribution systems," said a spokesman.

Kentucky appeared hardest hit. Gov. Wendell Ford declared the state a disaster area and, like several other governors, asked for federal help. "This is probably the most tragic day in Kentucky history," the governor said as reports filtered into his office about the tornadoes that struck a dozen countries in the center of the state.

Dwight L. Chapin, former White House aide, arrives at U.S. District Court in Washington Tuesday accompanied by his wife Susan. Chapin is charged in four counts of giving false information to a grand jury about his relations with Donald Segretti.

Jury to decide if Chapin lied

WASHINGTON (AP) — After hearing only two days of testimony, a federal jury debated yesterday whether President Nixon's former appointments secretary, Dwight L. Chapin, deliberately lied under oath to frustrate a grand jury probe.

Their choice was to decide whether there was "a pattern of deceit, a pattern of lies," as the government claimed, or whether he told the truth as he remembered it.

U. S. District Judge Gerhard A. Gesell delivered the case to the jurors at midafternoon after telling them: "You are deciding nothing but this case without any anger on the one hand, without any sympathy on the other."

The 33-year-old Chapin, who now lives in a Chicago suburb, was charged on three counts with making false statements last April 11 when one of the Watergate grand juries questioned him about the political sabotage executed by Donald H. Segretti during the 1972 primary campaigns.

Chapin had recruited Segretti, a friend from the days at the University of Southern California, for the job.

Each count carried a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a $10,000 fine.

The jury of seven men and five women was told in closing arguments by assistant prosecutor Richard J. Davis that Chapin sought all along to disassociate himself from the activities of the man he hired.

"Dwight Chapin never wanted the truth of his relationship with Donald Segretti known," Davis told the jury in a quiet voice.

"This pattern of deceit, a pattern of lies continued through April 11, 1973 when Mr. Chapin walked into that grand jury room, raised his hand and took the oath and swore that he would tell the truth.

House kills Viet aid

WASHINGTON (AP) — The House rejected last night any increase in U. S. military aid to South Vietnam.

An amendment to increase the aid by $274 million was rejected by a vote of 177 to 154 despite contentions that South Vietnam needs it to survive.

Critics accused the Pentagon of trying to make an end-run around the $1.126 billion limit on U. S. military aid to Saigon act by Congress last year and stressed they were not abandoning the South Vietnamese.

"The American people are not in a mood to abandon South Vietnam," said Rep. Otis G. Pike, D-N.Y., "but they're in a mood to question how much money they should pay."

But Rep. Robert L. F. Sikes, D-Fla., said that without the increase "we'll be out of business on helping South Vietnam survive."

After rejecting the increased military aid, the House approved a $1.14-billion supplemental defense-authorization bill by voice veto and sent it to the Senate.

An effort to cut $29 million for expanding a U. S. installation in the Indian Ocean in response to Soviet naval activities there was rejected 255 to 94.

The Pentagon had asked for a $474 million boost in U. S. military aid to Saigon for the fiscal year ending next June 30 but House Armed Services chairman F. Edward Hebert, D-La., offered an amendment to cut it to $274 million.

Hebert said he had learned from defense officials that they "could live with" the lower figure.

Several members including Rep. John F. Seiberling, D-Ohio, said U. S. aid should be halted but most critics urged only that the present U. S. aid not be increased.

Nixon commended for paying back taxes

WASHINGTON (AP) — A Senate-House investigating committee closed its books on President Nixon's tax case yesterday with a formal commendation for Nixon's decision to pay some $465,000 in back taxes and interest.

Any further congressional action thus was left to the House Judiciary Committee considering possible ground for impeachment.

The detailed report of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, concluding that Nixon was deficient $476,431 in back taxes and interest, will be considered along with all other evidence in its inquiry, the Judiciary Committee said.

The joint committee received the report from its staff Wednesday. After several hours' discussion, it decided to make the report public, but without endorsing it, pending further study.

Within four hours after contents of the report became known, the White House announced that the Internal Revenue Service had ruled Nixon owed roughly $465,000 and that he would pay, even though part of the sum was legally barred by the statute of limitations.

The White House refused, on Thursday, to make public the IRS notice to Nixon.

Deputy White House Press Secretary Gerald L. Warren told reporters the IRS report was delivered to the White House by three tax agents Tuesday afternoon.

A WHite House spokesman said there was no need to make the document public because it was compatible with the congressional staff report and is considerably less detailed.

Warren also said he understood there was a question about what will happen to the vice presidential papers Nixon turned over to the National Archives. He said Nixon would abide by whatever decision the archivists and others make that is "proper and relevant."

The big tax bill facing the President means that his financial position "has almost been totally wiped out," Warren said.

Questioned about how and when Nixon would pay his bill, Warren said a reassessment of Nixon's entire financial position must be made.

White House officials have not offered a precise calculation ot the total Nixon will pay, estimating it at $465,000 or $467,000.

The joint congressional committee held a brief session Thursday and issued a statement saying in part:

"While we have not completely analyzed all of the technical aspects of the report, the members agree with the substance of most of the recommendations made by the staff.

"Because of the President's decision to pay the deficiencies and interest for 1969 through 1972, as asserted by the Internal Revenue Service...the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation has decided to conclude its examination of the President's returns.

"The committee commends the President for his prompt decision to make these tax payments."

A Republican member, Sen. Carl T. Cutris of Nebraska, issued his own statement that "I concur in the motion to conclude the examination but dissent from the concurrence with the staff report."

Sen. Wallace F. Bennett of Utah, another Republican, scolded newsmen, expressing "consternation at the atmosphere in which this questioning is being conducted — as though the President is in fact guilty and somehow he has been allowed to escape..."

Several members joined Bennett in noting that the President went beyond his legal liability in agreeeing to pay a deficiency of about $171,000 on his 1969 taxes, since the three-year statute of limitations has run out on those.

The chairman, Sen. Russell B. Long, D-La., said "I certainly think he should be commended for that part of it...That can be regarded as a donation to this government."

"I think the President's experience would be a good example to everyone," Long said.

The committee vice chairman, Rep. Wilbur D. Mills, D-Ark., said the committee would be "far out of place" if it took up the question whether any fraud was committed in connection with the President's returns. Among reasons, he said, is because all its members might later have to vote on matters connected with impeachment.

"The House Judiciary Committee might, the IRS might, the courts might — but certainly it would ill become this committee to get into the question of fraud...," Mills said. "We didn't go into the question of the legality of it, the morality of it or the ethics of it. We only looked at the facts, made an audit — our staff did — reached a conclusion."

Perjury against FBI agent

ST. PAUL, Minn. (AP) — Judge Fred Nichol Thursday referred a perjury motion against the special agent in charge of the Minneapolis office of the FBI from his court to the Minnesota Division of U.S. District court.

However, Nichol continued jurisdiction over a contempt motion against FBI Special Agent Joseph Trimbach.

Lawyers for American Indian Movement leaders Dennis Banks and Russell Means claim Trimbach did not reveal all he knew about the alleged wiretapping of a telephone during the 71-day siege of Wounded Knee, S.D., last year.

Nichol, senior U.S. District Court Judge for South Dakota, is presiding over the case on a change of venue from Sioux Falls, S.D.

A government attorney, meanwhile, defended the FBI as having made a "sincere effort" to comply with a court order to disclose information helpful to two defendants in the Wounded Knee case.

Asst. U.S. Atty. R.D. Hurd, chief prosecutor in the case, testified during a special hearing dealing with the allegation, that he believed the FBI made a "sincere effort" to comply with a court order to disclose all information pertinent to the case against Banks and Means.

In the main trial, Means and Banks are accused of burglary, theft and other crimes in the 71-day occupation of the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation community.

The defense has asked dismissal of charges because of alleged wiretap and other misconduct."

Hurd told U.S. Dist. Judge Fred Nichol of his duties in connection with Wounded Knee before, during and after the occupation by some 200 armed Indians.

Under a "discovery" order issued by Nichol last October, the prosecution was to turn over to the defense copies of any government files helpful in defending Banks and Means.

However, some FBI files dealing with monitoring of a roadblock phone weren't released until two to three weeks ago.

During quizzing by defense attorney Kenneth Tilsen, Hurd defended the FBI with this: "I think they have made a sincere effort to comply with the order of the court on discovery matters."

Defense counsel contends the FBI not only hid memos relating to the phone but that Joseph Trimbach, head of the Minneapolis FBI office, had lied when testifying two weeks ago. Trimbach said he did not recall having seen an affidavit seeking Justice Department approval of a wiretap. The defense later introduced the affidavit bearing Trimbach's signature.

Ohio guards plead innocent

CLEVELAND, Ohio (AP) — Eight former Ohio National Guardsmen pleaded innocent today at their arraignment on federal charges stemming from the 1970 Kent State University shootings.

The former guardsmen filed silently into the federal court building downtown shortly before 10 a.m. Some held hands with their wives.

All eight were released on personal recognizance. Pretrial hearings have been set for Friday before U.S. District Court Judge Frank Battisti.

On Wednesday, four of the men asked through their attorney, Daniel Roth of Cleveland, to have the charges against them dropped.

Roth said in a motion that the defendants' rights to a speedy trial and due process of law were violated by the nearly four-year delay in calling a federal grand jury probe that produced the indictment.

The federal grand jury indicted the Guardsmen last Friday after investigating the May 4, 1970, confrontation of antiwar demonstrators and Guardsmen. Four students were shot to death, nine were wounded.

77 miners dead in African air disaster

FRANCISTOWN, Botswana (AP) — A plane carrying gold miners home to Malawi crashed and burned here Thursday, killing 77 persons in the second-worst air disaster in southern Africa, the South African Press Association said.

"It was like a real inferno. It was really blazing away," one of the first persons on the scene was quoted as saying. He was Dr. J.S. Moeti, superintendent of Francistown Hospital.

Reports said the plane caught fire after taking off from this remote town in northeastern Botswana near the Rhodesian border. It plummeted to earth while trying to return to the airport.

The dead included the pilot and copilot and 75 miners. The flight engineer and five passengers survived, reports said.

In Johannesburg the Star newspaper reported that the survivors were thrown clear when the plane crashed into thick bush about 2½ miles from the runway.

Two of them were in serious condition at Francistown hospital with third-degree burns, while the others were said to be satisfactory.

The passengers were returning to Blantyre and Lilongwe in Malawi after completing stints on the mines. It was believed the four-engine propeller-driven DC4 Skymaster was to have picked up a load of freshly recruited labor for the return leg.

The plane was operated by Wenela, an acronym for the Witwatersrand Native Labor Association. Wenela recruits black laborers throughout south-central Africa for the mines in South Africa and arranges transport to and from their homes.

The DC4 Skymaster tragedy was exceeded only by the 123 persons killed when a South African Airways jetliner crashed while taking off from Windhoek, South-West Africa, in April 1968.

Energy crisis impact report

Rural folks face fewer hardships

Has the energy crisis left an imprint on American life? To find out, Associated Press reporters talked with government leaders, businessmen and the man on the street to get a preliminary reading. In the final installment of a three-part series, the effects on rural areas are examined.

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

The gasoline lines, the renewed emphasis on mass transit, the skyrocketing utility bills are all things people in rural America have read about. But in most cases they've seen little of them.

The energy crisis, like other sudden changes in the country's lifestyle, has had some impact on rural America. But it is less noticeable and more likely to be ignored than in the cities and suburbs.

The problems of the cities generally reach the rural areas, but in a diluted form. And the millions of people who live there for the most part go about their daily lives much the way they always have.

Associated Press reporters who visited rural communities in five states in recent weeks reported there have been some changes because of the energy crisis. But the problems endured by many cities and suburbs translate into aggravations rather than crises for rural areas.

It is almost impossible to gauge what impact the energy situation will have on the future of small towns. But many who live there find it hard to believe any lasting changes will be forced upon them with the exception of high prices for gasoline.

Most rural areas visited by AP reporters have endured some changes:

—Gasoline prices are higher, and a few service stations have gone out of business. Small motels have experienced a drop in business.

—Citizens generally keep their thermostats lower.

—Some local stores report increased business because local residents are less likely to drive 50 miles or so to urban shopping centers. Other stores, such as clothing concerns, report a drop in business, and attribute it to local residents spending less because of higher prices for food and gasoline.

—Local residents who drive considerable distances to shop or to watch the local high school athletic teams are more likely to form car pools, and they aren't taking as many trips.

"There's been really no gasoline shortage here," said Mayor Shelby Combs of Nicholasville, Ky. "If the energy crisis were to get worse I don't know what would happen here. I suppose we could be hurt, but we haven't been yet."

John Sutherland, an automobile dealer in Nicholasville, said "people around here were looking for small cars for a while, but that's beginning to change already."

All of which is not to say the latest American crisis hasn't been felt in Nicholasville. One local motel reported its business down 40 per cent and some residents said they were making fewer shopping trips to Lexington.

The energy crisis

And for some in rural America, like Jay Davis, there has been an energy crisis.

Davis, 28, moved to Colfax, Wash., last year and began managing a service station with a staff of six, a large repair business and gasoline sales of 1,000 gallons a day.

"Then this energy crisis thing started, with allotments of gas always going lower and lower," he said. "We were down to 350 gallons a day when I left to be a fire department captain. By that time, Davis said his monthly income had plunged from $1,300 to $600.

In Colfax, a wheat farming area where last year's record prices have brought a degree of prosperity, the local Sears store said orders were up 10 per cent; the manager attributed it to persons who make fewer shopping trips to Spokane. The local library said it could not keep how-to books on the shelves any more. "People are staying home more and need things to do," explained the librarian.

In Harvard, Mass., an affluent town of 3,300 people located 32 miles west of Boston, the housing industry has suffered. In recent years towns like Harvard have grown as people moved farther out of the center city. But that has stopped, at least temporarily.

Inquiries about homes have been cut in half, realtors say, and in the first 10 weeks of this year seven houses were sold in Harvard. Last year, in the same period, 16 were sold. Of 18 houses built last fall in a Harvard subdivision, only three have been sold.

The only service station in Harvard is open about half the days of the month because of the gasoline shortage, but the state's odd-even rationing system has ended the long lines that used to prevail.

In Plant City, Fla., a town of 20,000 about 25 miles east of Tampa, a gasoline station went out of business and there were long lines until a voluntary odd-even rationing plan took effect. But the winter strawberry crop — the main industry — got to market except when there was a truckers' strike. The local gift shop's business went up when local residents didn't want to drive to Tampa. Service stations closed early. Some residents formed car pools for shopping. Now it's getting back to normal, officials say.

Plant City was generally typical of the small towns the reporters visited. They found people coping with their problems, and some of them cynical about what had caused the trouble.

Speaking of the oil companies, Joan Stockwell of Colfax said:

"I just think they wanted more money. It's like the wheat shortage. There was one, we were told ... We were told there would be no flour. But at the store, there was flour. Of course, it cost more ... This is the kind of thing you just learn to live with. There's no sense making a big deal out of it.

Possible oil refinery for Newington, N.H.

By ROBERT MEDEIROS
Associated Press Writer

NEWINGTON, N.H. (AP) — Officials for a Boston oil firm will make a presentation tonight before the Newington Planning Board for an oil refinery in this seacoast-area town, the board chairman said today.

A request for an opportunity to make the presentation before the board was made two weeks ago by Frank Chadwick, vice president of C.H. Sprague & Son Oil Co., chairman Robert Lamson said.

Lamson said the proposal was for a "small refinery that would produce about 50,000 barrels of oil a day."

Construction costs for the refinery would be in "the neighborhood of $10 million" and would provide about 200 new jobs for this town of 550 residents, Lamson said.

The company built a facility in Newington last summer to process so-called refined crude oil on land it owns near its Atlantic Terminal oil docks.

The facility, called a "petroleum separator," separates two petroleum products mixed for transmission through a pipeline and turns out the separate components, such as gasoline and home-heating oil.

Lamson said that according to the Sprague proposal, the refinery would be built on the company's own land and it wouldn't require taking additional land. The refinery would be built near Sprague's oil docks and tank farm on the Piscataqua River where it enters Great Bay.

The location is across the bay from Durham Point, site of a 400,000-barrel-a-day refinery proposed by Aristotle Onassis which has encountered strong local opposition.

Other New Hampshire areas mentioned as possible refinery sites include Rochester and Newmarket. New England now has no refineries.

A spokesman for Save Our Shores, a group of Seacoast area residents who opposed the Onassis proposal, said the group was planning to attend a meeting at 1:30 p.m. today with Sprague officials.

AAA says 10% gas stations open Sunday in state

BOSTON (AP) — Approximately the same number of gasoline stations will be open in New England this Sunday as a week earlier, according to a survey Thursday by the New England clubs of the American Automobile Association.

The AAA said its survey of nearly 400 stations indicated that 21 per cent would be open Sunday, including six per cent in Rhode Island, 10 per cent in Massachusetts, 20 per cent in Connecticut, 30 per cent in Vermont and 40 per cent in New Hampshire.

Most stations were reported to be selling gasoline all day this week, and 32 per cent of those surveyed were selling after 6 p.m., compared with 26 per cent the week before, the AAA said.

It said 75 per cent of stations in Massachusetts and Connecticut were selling gasoline all day, as were most stations in New Hampshire, Maine, Vermont and Rhode Island.

Gas tapping to increase daily supply 4%

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Federal Energy Office ordered yesterday the tapping of some 11.1 million barrels of gasoline from inventories to increase the nation's average daily supply in April by about four per cent.

The FEO said its April gasoline allocations were designed to ensure that every state gets at least 90 per cent as much gasoline as it got in April, 1972, adjusted for growth in vehicle registrations since then.

But to achieve this distribution — more equal than in March or February — the gasoline supply available per day must decrease for a dozen states and the District of Columbia, while it increases for 36 states; the daily supply of two states remains unchanged.

The FEO figures indicate that Vermont is to receive 13 per cent less gasoline per day in April than in March and Texas 10 per cent less.

Other states whose per-day allocation was cut were: Arkansas, one per cent less; Arizona, six per cent; District of Columbia, three per cent; Florida, two per cent; Georgia, four per cent; Illinois, one per cent; Kansas, four per cent; Louisiana, five per cent; Massachusetts, four per cent; Oklahoma, nine per cent and Wyoming, six per cent.

The per-day allocations of Idaho and New Hampshire were virtually unchanged.

Thirteen states were assigned April per-day increases ranging from 10 to 29 per cent, compared with March.

They were: Alaska, 29 per cent; Hawaii, 16 per cent; Iowa, 15 per cent; Indiana, 14 per cent; Michigan, 11 per cent; Missouri, 14 per cent; Montana, 14 per cent; North Carolina, 29 per cent; Ohio, 17 per cent; Oregon, 10 per cent; Rhode Island, 16 per cent; South Carolina, 11 per cent; and West Virginia, 14 per cent.

The other states were assigned per-day increases ranging from one to nine per cent.

Mobil prices up

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) — Local Mobile gas dealers indicate they will have to pass on to customers an announced 5.6 cent increase in the wholesale price per gallon.

A Mobile spokesman has announced the price increase applies to all grades of gas and reflects higher production costs.

"If they raise the price, I'll have to raise it too," said Charles Pare, owner of Elmwood Mobil.

Meanwhile, a large gap between gas prices remains at local stations. In Providence, there is an 11-cent spread between the lowest and highest prices of regular gas.

Legislature urged to keep Racial Imbalance Law

BOSTON, Mass. (AP) — State education officials, supported by Cardinal Humberto Medeiros, urged the state legislature Thursday to "stand fast" against the widening campaign to repeal the nine-year old Racial Imbalance Law.

Following Wednesday's emotional testimony by opponents of the 1965 law, the legislature's Education Committee spent a full second day hearing supporters of the statute which is unique in the nation.

Pending before the committee are 33 bills to repeal or amend the law.

The proponents did not match the opposition in numbers, but a crowd of several hundred persons — mostly black residents of Boston — gave frequent and lengthy standing ovations to a long list of speakers who defended the Racial Imbalance Law as the means to guarantee quality education to all state residents.

The law which has been the focus of annual attempts at repeal or crippling amendment, states that any public school with a student body more than 50 per cent non-white must be further integrated to alter the white to non-white ratio.

The law has had its greatest impact on Boston and Springfield.

State Education Commissioner Gregory R. Anrig told the legislative Committee Thursday, "We can defer to the federal courts or to those who would divide us, or we can again measure up to the traditions of our Commonwealth for integrity and stand fast. I urge you to do just that."

Anrig, supported by state Board of Education Chairman Rae Cecilia Kipp, quoted a state Supreme Court decision on the imbalance law which said: "The time for testing the meaning of the statute has long since passed and the time for prompt action to implement it is at hand."

Cardinal Medeiros said the Boston Archdiocese has supported the law, "because it is right."

He said legislators and school officials must act now "to insure every child the best education in the most balanced environment." The Cardinal termed implementation of the imbalance law "a step on the road to racial justice."

Rep. Royal L. Bolling Sr., D-Boston, a sponsor of the original law, called it "the biggest catalyst for educational progress in the last 20 years."

He drew sustained applause when he urged the legislators — especially the suburbanites who have continually supported the law — to "keep the faith of minority people alive in the Commonwealth."

The Education Committee has in the past refused to endorse imbalance law repeal bills.

Unlike Wednesday's hearing, preceded by a march by thousands to the State House and supported by many legislators and municipal officials from Boston and Springfield, testimony Thursday came largely from black community leaders and private groups such as the League of Women Voters and the Civil Liberties Union of Massachusetts.

Twice in the past Sargent has vetoed bills which would have weakened the law.

Ruling expected 'soon'

BOSTON (AP) — The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court heard arguments yesterday in a move by the City of Springfield to block implementation of a school racial balance plan, and court sources said a ruling could be expected "relatively soon."

Springfield Solicitor William C. Flanagan asked the court to set aside an October 1973 order requiring the city to bus 5,800 pupils in six of its seven school districts to comply with the 1965 state racial balance law.

The law says no school can have a non-white enrollment of more than 50 per cent. Five elementary schools in Springfield are racially imbalanced under the provision of the law.

The state board of education ordered the six-district plan implemented, but the city school committee never approved the proposal.

Flanagan maintained the board failed to give serious consideration to another plan that would have involved the busing of fewer students to achieve racial balance in two elementary grades.

MIT to research Dial-A-Ride

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. (AP) — The Massachusetts Institute of Technology has received a federal grant of $150,000 to do research on a "Dial-A-Ride" bus system originally developed on the campus here.

Research for the program, sponsored by the U.S. Department of Transportation, will focus upon experiments to be carried out in Rochester, N.Y.

Under the Dial-A-Ride program, already in operation experimentally in various sections of the nation, a radio-equipped bus is directed by dispatcher to a location to pick up a person who called a special phone number for a ride.

The MIT research program will experiment with a potential rider dialing to a computer, which in turn will automatically dispatch the specially equipped bus to the pick-up point.

Sly in Providence Saturday

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) — The Providence Bureau of Licenses has issued a permit for a rock concert by Sly and the Family Stone at the Civic Center, Saturday.

The bureau had delayed in issuing the permit until the concert's promoters posted a bond Wednesday giving the city, the Civic Center and the Providence Redevelopment Agency $100,000-$300,000 insurance coverage for injury and $100,000 for property damage.

The last time the band appeared here, in 1969, the concert was followed by a window smashing spree along North Main Street, city officials said.

Woman seeks to keep maiden name

PORTLAND, Maine (AP) — The Maine Supreme Court is expected to issue a ruling in a few weeks on whether Susan Reben can legally retain the right to use her maiden name, Hirsch.

The woman's husband, Howard T. Reben, a cooperating attorney for the Maine Civil Liberties Union, argued her case before Chief Justice Armand A. Dufresne Jr., Wednesday. Mrs. Reben's petition to use her maiden name was denied last October in Cumberland County Probate Court by Judge Lloyd LaFountain.

Reben argued that his wife's sole reason for seeking to use her maiden name is "based on a belief that a woman should be under no compulsion to use her husband's name after marriage."

Why can't girls play with boys?

NEW HAVEN, Conn. (AP) — U.S. District Judge Jon Newman has ordered Fairfield Little League Baseball Inc. to show cause why girls should not be permitted to play baseball with boys.

Newman's order Wednesday followed the filing of a suit on behalf of Melissa Needle, 9, of Fairfield.

Her suit charges that Little League officials are discriminating strictly on the basis of sex by permitting only boys on its teams. This is prohibited by state law barring sex discrimination in places of "public accommodation," the suit says.

It further claims that the young girl is being denied equal protection of the law under the U.S. Constitution.

A hearing on the show cause order was scheduled for next Wednesday.

Named as defendants are Chairman William Maxwell of the Fairfield Little League board; John Sullivan, Fairfield first selectman; and six members of the town's board of education.

The town, through the board of education, provides the fields for the 48 major and minor league teams in the league.

The lot of farmworkers: no room for neutrality

By BOB CALLAHAN

The United Farm Workers (UFW) are presently organizing farmworkers in Southern California and Arizona, in an attempt to give the workers higher wages and more control over conditions in the field. Farmworkers have been, historically, the most exploited labor force in the country. Their attempts to unionize have consequently generated very much intense opposition.

The arguments of the growers and supporters of the American Farm Bureau have essentially maintained that the farmworkers themselves do not want the UFW to represent them. The desperate conditions that the farmworkers must live in, are generally not in dispute, so that the basis of attack of most opponents of the UFW has been the misrepresentation of workers interests by the UFW. These are, however, some very fundemental problems in this position.

Most lettuce and grape pickers are now working under Teamster Union contracts. The terms of Teamster contracts provide drastically reduced benefits for the workers in terms of wages, grievance procedures, child labor, health and legal care and pesticide control. The dues for these benefits are $8.00 per month per worker, whereas UFW dues are $3.50 per month. UFW contracts also provide for hiring through a union hall as opposed to the feudal labor contractor system that still persists under Teamster contracts. A labor contractor will deduct an average 22 percent of the salary of each worker as part of his fee. He also charges exhorbitant prices for food, housing and transportation and quite often makes false social security and tax deductions which he pockets himself. So that simply in terms of cost, a UFW contract provides the least expensive conditions to work under. Contractors also pick workers every day and decide where and when they will work. The labor contractor system is one of the most exploitative labor relationships possible, yet still most farmworkers are forced to work under it today.

Representatives of the Teamster Union negotiate all their contracts with the growers and then impose these contracts on the workers. The UFW provides for worker representation on each contract negotiation team, so that the workers themselves have real input into the contracts they must work under. The UFW actively builds worker involvement in decision making. The explicitly racist attitude of Teamster officials insures that worker representation in their Union is only a dream.

For most farmworkers the distinctions are clear and their allegiances are clear. Even the California Supreme Court ruled that the use of Teamster contracts represents a complete substitution of grower wishes for worker wishes. The right of the workers to decide, for themselves, which union will represent them has been central to the struggle of the UFW.

Quite often it is argued that the fact that many workers are presently working under Teamster contracts is prima faciae evidence of their support for these contracts. This naive assumption overlooks the desperate poverty of the farmworkers that compels them to work under any conditions available. Workers have expressed their overwhelming support for the UFW in past elections and in repeated strikes and walkouts that protest Teamster contracts. The sympathies of the workers are clear enough to growers and Teamster officials, so that they have consistently refused to allow elections. The UFW has supported and actively pressed for the right of the workers to have free, secret-ballot, supervised elections. Several of the UFW contracts have been won by elections whereas all the present Teamster contracts have been negotiated solely with the growers and then forced upon the workers. None are the result of free elections. An election, as urged by the UFW would easily clarify the representation issue.

The need to examine our own individual relationship to the brutal oppression of farmworkers is compelling, for each one of us has input into their struggle that is very real and direct. It is important for everyone to thoroughly investigate the issues involved and to reach as complete and understanding as possible concerning the struggle of farmworkers to unionize. Our lives have immediate implications for the farm laborers of California. People must boycott all table grapes, non-UFW lettuce and Gallo, Guild and Franzia wines. Our support is crucial to their struggle. There is no neutrality possible in our position; we either contribute to their liberation or to their oppression.

People can begin to learn more about the struggle of the farmworkers by coming to hear Dolores Huerta, the vice-President of the UFW, speak at the Student Union Ballroom, this afternoon at 2:30. The speech will be followed by a mass picket at A&P i. Northampton at 5:00.

COACHELLA, CAL., April 2 — FARM WORKERS ARRESTED IN VINEYARD CONFRONTATION — Deputies lead striking members of the United Farm Workers Union off to jail as fellow pickets yell in protest at a vineyard near Coachella, Cal., whose owners have signed a labor contract with the Teamsters Union. Authorities, who made 135 arrests Thursday, took additional strikers into custody today.

Packs invade the Manor

To The Editor:

Don't get me wrong, I like dogs, its just that I value my life more than a dog's life. On Monday I was driving home to Brittany Manor from UMass. As I came in the entrance of Brittany Manor a German Shepard jumped out from the side of the road at my motorcycle. The next thing I knew, there I was dazed, laying on the ground ten feet from the motorcycle. As I slowly got up I noticed blood running off my left hand and two large scrapes on both knee caps. Fortunately I was able to walk away from the accident (that's more than I can say for my smashed up motorcycle that sustained two hundred dollars worth of damage.) By the way the dog is alright.

What bothers me is what if I had landed on my back or my head? I could have been paralyzed for life or killed due to a dog. Some of the blame lies with the owner who should of taught his or her dog not to chase cars and motorcycles. The main blame lies with Brittany Manor. There are just too many dogs running around freely. At times I have seen six or seven dogs running in a pack. One pack consisted of a St. Bernard, German Shepard and other large dogs. Packs of dogs can endanger not only children but adults as well. One of my roommates has already been attacked by two dogs that tried to knock him down.

There has to be some control over dogs. Some sort of leash law is needed, especially at Brittany Manor. Other motorcyclists at Brittany Manor have narrowly escaped dumping their bikes due to free roaming dogs. I was lucky I wasn't killed, but unless something is done about the dog problem, someone is going to be seriously injured. I should not have to risk my life driving around Brittany Manor.

5¢ charge: laughable, ridiculous

To The Editor:

I am writing in response to your front-page editorial which appeared on April 1, "It's time to make everyone pay". As a graduate student who took her undergraduate degree at this university, I am insulted by the proposal that I should pay 5 cent a copy for the privilege of reading the Collegian. The fact that the daily was chartered as an "undergraduate newspaper" does not, by any stretch of the imagination, mean that it should not be available to graduate students on the same basis as to undergraduates. We, too, are members of this academic community. I have read, enjoyed, and helped to support the Collegian from 1969 to 1973, and I regard this change in policy as an affront. If this is the way the board of ditors feels, then I no longer have any need for the Collegian, and shall gladly pay my 20 cents for a copy of the New York Times each day.

It is laughable that you choose to discriminate against a segment of the university community, and then in the next breath simultaneously encourage their "input into your editorial judgements" and refuse them positions on the staff. If you are going to charge us 5 cents a copy, I should think you would feel obligated to re-charter your paper, allowing for active participation by graduate students.

I find your threat of "appropriate legal action" against postgraduates who fail to deposit their nickels slightly ridiculous. If you really want to restrict your readership, you might try implementing the following program:

(1) Post undercover watchmen randomly at all Collegian distribution points to make spot I.D. checks and-or ask all suspiciously postgraduate-looking characters to present their documentation.

(2) All individuals caught in the act of stealing Collegians should be placed under citizens' arrest and taken to Dickinson Hall for processing.

(3) In view of the economic differentials pertaining to the groups concerned, graduate students should be charged 5 cents for each Collegian instructors 7 cents, assistant professors 10 cents, associate professors 15 cents, and full professors 25 cents. Senior citizens, of course, should be allowed 1 (one) Daily Collegian free of charge. (Since there are very few of this last category on campus, you will not lose much money. Besides, it's good public relations.)

Susan M. Mulcahy

Sorry C.C.

To The Editor:

Due to an unfortunate error in communications, a letter regarding the Campus Center Store and SUB concourse policy was printed on April 3. After the letter was written a meeting between the Services committee, Denny Matteau, and myself was held in which the issue of selling our shirts was resolved. Unfortunately, we neglected to inform the Collegian in time to stop our first letter from being published.

We are not retracting our opinion that the undergrads need a better deal regarding use of the concourse, but we have, in the course of our dealings with the Services committee over the past week, resolved our individual issue of selling our "streaker" shirts. We sold them to the store.

Big bad boogie still on

To The Editor:

Unfortunately Sylvan Area has suffered the same kind of malicious damage that was suffered by Webster House a few weeks ago. It seems as though someone has been ripping down our posters for the upcoming BIG BAD BOOGIE. The people of Webster were a bit luckier than us, they knew who their culprit was, we don't. It is sad that organizations can't put up advertsiements for their events without having them ripped down by the "competition". Posters are expensive, but necessary items for any event. The expense is compounded when they don't even get seen by the public as the result of a selfish few.

Despite this obstacle, and the seeming lack of advertisement, THE BIG BAD BOOGIE is still on!!!! It will be held at Worcester Dining Commons East Room on Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

It is my hope that this kind of serious selfishness will not continue. We should all share poster space on a first-come, first-served basis. My adives to other groups is in the future, glue your posters to the wall!!!!

Our Panama Canal

Comrade (Russian style) Kissinger is negotiating, among other things, a treaty that would return the Panama Canal to the communist and socialist-dominated country of Panama. It is nothing short of a sellout, an illegal one at that.

The popular myth about the Canal is that the United States has leased it since construction of the canal was started. Not true. Before construction of the canal was started, the United States purchased the territory known as the Canal Zone for ten million dollars. They also bought the rights to build the canal from a French company that had earlier failed an attempt to build such a Canal. Even before construction started, an American named William Gorgas worked for years to rid Panama of the yellow fever-carrying mosquito, thus ridding Panama of a plague that had been bothering Central and South America for decades.

In 1914, the Canal was opened. Since then, it has greatly helped U. S. trade and the trade of other nations as well. So far, politics have not ever interfered in the operation of this canal, as is the problem with the Suez Canal.

One of Lenin's objectives was to throw the United States out of the Canal Zone and place it under international jurisdiction. The parrots that have followed Lenin and their follower-parrots have worked for this same objective ever since. And now, Panamaniac dictator Omar Torrijos has joined their side. After all, he is a communist agent.

The 1903 Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty gave the United States sovereignty over the Canal Zone "in perpetuity." It specifically excluded Panama from this territory. It provided for the ten million dollars the United States paid for the Canal, not to just the Panamanian government, but to the individual owners of the land. THE CANAL ZONE IS EXCLUSIVE PROPERTY OF THE UNITED STATES AS MUCH AS WASHINGTON, D.C.

The problem with the Canal is that it is vital to the well-being of the Western Hemisphere. If the canal ever was to be controlled by a nation hostile to the United States, there is sure to be trouble. Seventy per cent of the traffic going through the Canal either originates or terminates in the U. S. If this traffic were not permitted to use the canal because it was controlled by a nation unfriendly to us, U. S. trade would be severely crippled.

The United States has always been fair in the use of the Panama Canal. The Panama Canal must not meet the fate the Suez Canal has had since 1967. There are reports that several congressmen are preparing to fight Kissinger's scheme. If you oppose this move, write your congressman and urge him to fight the sellout of the Panama Canal.

Help wanted

Johnny Barebutt, a friend of mine who drives a Ding Dong Ice Cream Cart that services the White House Executive Wing overheard a conversation between President Nixon, Vice President Ford, Alexander Haig and Ron Zeigler as the four stood around sucking lemon popsicles Monday.

Nixon was upset about the lack of attention being given to the government, now that Watergate has confused everyone to the point of detachment.

"We need something to get people to pay more attention to us if we are ever going to restore the credibility of the government to average America," Nixon said. "There are hundreds of things happening every day that get attention, but we seem to get nothing but neglect and scorn. I paid my back taxes, I've flown on a commercial jet, I went to the "Grand Ole Opry," I let King Timahoe get a lap of my birthday cake, I am doing everything to let people know that I am just a plain old American, and all they do is holler about impeaching me. This has got to change." I need some ideas from you people." Ziegler, you used to work at Disneyland. You know about the media, what could we do to get some favorable attention?"

"How about if you go to a baseball game and sit in the bleachers with the rest of the working class, or go to Laurel Park and make a few two dollar bets on a horse?"

"I can't go to a baseball game, because Ford already went to see Hank Aaron hit his 714th home run, and I sure can't go to a race track because if I won I'd have to declare the winnings on my taxes and now that I have to pay back 432 thousand dollars I can't afford any more taxes." How about you two, Al. "Gerry, do you have any ideas?"

"I do, I do, Mr. President," blurted Ford, "I always have a better idea."

"Yeah, I know, what do you have in mind this time?"

"Well, I have been watching the news lately, and every time there is a major news happening a streaker interrupts it and gets all kinds of attention."

"That's great! That's just what we can do. When that damn Rondino is bearing down on me in his committee we can send a streaker through the meeting room, the whole proceeding will stop, and I can stay in office." A brilliant idea for sure."

"I think so too Gerry," said Haig, "but now we have to decide who to get. If we really want to outdo all the other streaking scenes then we have to get someone famous."

"Well I have a lot of friends that are out of work. How about Ted Agnew," asked the President.

"No," said Ziegler, everytime he gets involved in an athletic event someone gets hurt. Remember his famous beanballs in golf and tennis?"

"How about Mitchell, he needs money," asked Nixon.

"Too fat, and besides who ever heard of a streaker that smokes a pipe?", said Haig.

"How about Kissinger, he dashes around a lot anyway."

"He just got married, he couldn't do it."

"Yeah, this is really a problem said Ford.

"You're right Gerry," said the President, "good help in government is tough to find these days."

Media and race

By LUIS MANUEL MEDINA

The University of Massachusetts, a suburb of the Megalopolis stretching from Washington to Boston; reflects many of the challenges that today's society is facing.

Mass media and communications are examples of this. Traditionally mass media has not provided enough channels for the Third World Communities to get involved in it. The high concentration of people in a small place necessitates the need for more mass media, used to reporte the diverse groups that live in it.

This is of vital importance, because, according to Rivers-Anderson-Jensen, "Americans have come to take the mass media so much for granted, that it would be hard for most of them to imagine a world without the media". But there are other people in America that must have equal access to the media for its uses and benefits. Then they can contribute to their own particular communities, and also become involved in American journalism.

Journalism in America is not diverse enough to present an accurate picture of different cultures, nor does it offer an equal amount of economical support, advertisements, etc., to those of different cultures, professions and educational background.

According to Dr. Howard Ziff, head of the UMass journalistic studies department, the number of minority groups working in media is not high. Traditionally, 'minorities' have looked into other areas to become professional. Many Latin Americans, for example, have chosen law and medicine.

Professors of the Third World Community at UMass have expressed the same concern over this lack of opportunities for Third World people to enter journalism. Black professors pointed to the problem of lack of equality and sensibility in American journalism toward Blacks.

For Spanish Americans, especially Puerto Ricans and Cubans in the mainland and Puerto Rico, one of the biggest problems is the English language. However this situation is changing and more bilingual publications are being printed.

Campus journalism could be improved if Third World students had more access to the campus communications. To acheive this the opportunities must be made available to them, as Ziff said.

Third World people on this campus have been proving that they can do the job. Many campus publications testify to that, such as, Drug, CCEBS Newsletter, 5 College Black Studies, Newsletter, Dubois Lines and The Mass Eco Latino. Each of these publications fulfills specific needs in the campus community. However campus publications and radio stations must provide access to Third World students. The Collegian is one of those publications that must encourage the participation of those students.

As an individual, a student at the university, and a member of the Third World community I would like to see more coverage of minority groups in an objective manner. I dissaprove of an unfair judgement being made of an entire staff because of the attitudes of some of its members and because of production mistakes.

A meeting will be held next Wednesday for all people interested in this situation and willing to find ways for the development of the campus media, with more participation from members of the campus community. It is certainly a step into the right direction.

Luis Manuel Medina is a Collegian Commentator.

Daniels case laid on Sarge

Dear Governor Sargent:

The group that is sponsoring the April 3 program at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst — "A Nine Year Old in Norfolk Prison" — that you are unfortunately unable to attend wil' be going to Boston on April 9. We will be meeting with members of the legislature throughout the day concerning the Russell Daniels case. The meetings will begin at twelve noon. We would like to request an appointment with you on that date, either a private meeting or your attendance at a group meeting of legislators and concerned citizens.

Considering your great concern for your retarded citizens the serious implications of this case on the delivery of human services in Massachusetts and on our criminal justice system cannot have escaped you. We feel that meeting with a group of citizens who are willing to accept the responsibility of acting as advocates for the rights and needs of those who are currently unable to do so should be a top priority for anyone in a position such as yours.

We would appreciate a response as soon as possible. If we are unable to obtain an appointment on April 9, we would like to make one on the soonest possible date.

Sincerely yours,
William H. Smith

Tripoli errs, victim of standards

To The Editor:

So, fuck the school work, it'll wait. Most of the time I just don't bother taking the time out to respond to the bullshit white people write about racism in the Collegian. I guess that's one of the luxuries I, as a white male, enjoy in our society. Well, here it is Mr. Tripoli ex-editor in chief of the Collegian. You hit it right on your big white nose, when you said "The generalities are grotesque, highlighted by the assumption that all white America is racist." That assumption sadly enough is true, myself included among the racists.

Being the intelligent young man that you are, I'm sure you can see that a person living in America today has to be affected by the WHITE T.V. programming, WHITE newspapers and magazines (of which the Collegian is one) and WHITE INSTITUTIONS IN GENERAL. Mostly everything in this country revolves around our white standards, barely recognizing anything Third World Community, unless we're forced to in some way or another.

One last point, about your bogus assumption that, the authors of "Blacks Protest Collegian; issue statement", have no company (in supporting that article) in or out of the Black community—I'll agree "out" of the Black community; it sometimes gets very lonely trying to find support from other whites. But to say "in" the Black community there was no support of that article, well, Mr. Tripoli ex-editor in chief of the Collegian all I can say is, you must be real fucking HIGH!

Married students housing

To The Editor:

The Married Student Housing Office's idea of an April Fool's joke is apparently to decide on a rent increase of 25 per cent - an average of $500 year — for persons in University and Lincoln Apartments. The rationale offered is that a new budgeting system is being put into effect, incorporating the financing of all married student housing under one rubric. The actual results, however, will be quite different: in effect, low income and foreign married students will be paying for the comforts of married students in newer complexes and with, in general, relatively more means.

The $500 a year rent-raise will obviously have other consequences: it will drive some of the poorer married students right out of an education, or commit one or the other of the married partners to find a job of some kind (not that this isn't already the pattern for many married students—rent and grocery money has to come from somewhere. It's inconceivable, meanwhile, that most working married students will get raises sufficient to match the raise in rents.)

This decision to raise the rent was not only arbitrary, in the sense of ignoring its human consequences—i.e. misery—but was also carried out in a deceitful way. The decision meeting was originally to be held during Spring break, but because of married student protest, was moved to April 1. Big Deal: the meeting was closed, or said to be closed according to announcements hurriedly pasted up by housing office personell that morning. Another meeting is promised, but it obviously can't amount to much since married students in Lincoln and University will be presented with a fait accompli. The amount of the rent increase is horrendous enough, and the tactics used to push it through were, quite simply, cheap, shitty, sniggering.

Strike? Or strike three?

Sincerely,
Bob Abel

Tackeff facts off; U.F.W. elections

To The Editor:

It is a sadly ironic fact that Matt Tackeff, who in his April 4 editorial exhorted people to "Get all the facts before you accept the United Farm Workers claims" should state the facts so totally erroneously.

His accusation, "To date, Mr. Chavez has opposed any calls for free elections", ignores the facts. In 1965 Cesar Chavez and the grape workers asked the grape growers for elections and were refused. On August 30, 1966, Mr. Chavez' union won the first secret-ballot election in farm labor organizing history at the Di Giorgio Corporation, with the company campaigning for the Teamsters.

In Steptember 1966 the farm workers union asked Perelli-Minetti for an election and were refused. In June of 1967, Giumarra Vineyards, the largest table-grape grower in the country, was asked for an election and refused. In 1968 all California and Arizona table-grape growers were asked for an election; none responded. In July and August 1970 Mr. Chavez' union asked lettuce growers for elections. All but one refused.

In all these cases strikes showed the overwhelming preference and desire of the workers for the United Farm Workers representation. From 1965 to 1971 there were over fifty valid elections in agriculture in the West. The United Farm Workers won in every case but one, which is on appeal.

Nestelbaum writes garbage

To The Editor:

I am adressing myself to the column of Zamir Nestlebaum in today's Collegian. Besides being an entirely false, degrading piece of trash, this article borders on libel.

Mr. Nestlebaum apparently "knows" that area governments are useless. Why? Because everyone "knows" that they are. In direct contrast, area governments can be, and are effective in meeting specific needs of the students. Central Area's own government in the last year has funded:

1) A new craft shop located in Greenough
2) A snack bar located in Greenough
3) Numerous coffee houses
4) Various movies and movie series
5) The Central Area Counseling Center
6) The Third World Center of Central Area
7) F.L.A.P. Program
8) A Women's Center

If Mr. Nestlebaum would deign to walk down four flights of stairs to his own basement, he would see just how effective his area government is...but he is too involved writing ignorant garbage.

Mr. Nestlebaum seems to believe that the Student Senate can possibly listen to and act upon each individual request from each individual area from each individual student; he is full of shit. The Student Senate, instead of a four hour meeting on Wednesday nights, would be a 24 hour meeting three days per week.

Add on top of that the Student Senate's propensity to debate for hours about nothing, and you end up with a completely disorganized travesty, with practically no student input.

I have yet to see Mr. Nestlebaum at any of Central's meetings, and thus all of his arguments are assertions and completely baseless in fact. I welcome his attendance at our meetings to determine his area government's effectiveness.

Progressive journalist?

To The Editor:

On March 4th the Women's Show stated on the air: "Denny Matteau on March 3 disassociated herself from the rascist and ignorant Collegian staff and she called for black people and women with a commitment to ending rascism and male supremacy in this country to take over the Collegian by writing and getting on the staff." We would like to support Denny's letter and add that one of the ways to insure that the Collegian will really change would be for all progressive people who want to do journalism to get together and move as a force into the staff. As a group with a common commitment Collegian writers could give each other support and constructive criticism and prevent each other from giving up, losing confidence or feeling alone, which is what usually happens to individuals when they try to change a system."

The collectively run Women's Show happens each week because of a media class we started at Southwest Women's Center. Similar classes in journalism could be started as Orchard Hill or Southwest 3 credit courses if we could locate a teacher-coordinator with both journalism skills and truly progressive politics. If anyone has ideas for a teacher (they will be paid) contact us at WMUA or at Southwest Women's Center 5-0626 or tell your area residencial college to get moving.

Ripped off? Called fraud division

To The Editor:

Many students have complained about being ripped off. This need not happen. Massachusetts has some of the strongest comsumer protection legislation in the United States. If you feel you have been ripped off you should call one of the following consumer protection offices run by Attorney General Quinn's Consumer Protection Division. This Division is known for its results, saving Massachusetts consumers approximately $100 million by intervening on the recent utility rate hearings, and will listen to all complaints whether big or small.

The tenure debate

'On going review' better than quota: Lynton

What is tenure? Who gets it? Why have it? Critics say tenure — guaranteeing employment to professors after seven years of teaching, scholarship and service — limits flexibility in staffing and stifles natural drifts in academic disciplines. Supporters hail it as an essential guarantee of freedom of expression for University professors.

Before spring vacation, The Collegian printed two of three brief essays on the nature of tenure, in an effort to describe its benefits and liabilities for students and stake out the areas of disagreement between UMass faculty and administrators.

The first two essays were by William F. Enteman of Union College, and Prof. Loren P. Beth here at UMass-Amherst. Today, Ernest A. Lynton, UMass senior vice-president for academic affairs, gives what he describes as "some thoughts on tenure" in a statement prepared especially for publication in the Collegian. The essay is part of a lengthy University-wide tenure statement now in the final drafting stages at the President's office in Boston.

By ERNEST A. LYNTON
UMass Vice-president

The University's policy on the granting of tenure, adopted by the Board of Trustees in November, 1972, clearly enunciates two basic principles.

The first is that tenure must reflect outstanding contributions in the past as well as the promise of continuing excellence in the future. The granting of tenure by an institution is an affirmative act which must be based on positive evidence of excellence. Mere adequacy is not sufficient, and the absence of positive reasons to grant tenure is in itself a reason not to grant it.

The necessary outstanding achievement of a candidate for tenure must be in one or more of the broad areas of professional activity: scholarship, teaching, and professional service. The weight given to an individual's accomplishments and capabilities in each of these areas in his or her overall evaluation can vary from person to person, as well as among the several departments and schools within the University.

But in the aggregate, I believe that all three are vitally important to a public university, and we must be certain that we do not pay lip service to them all while we in fact look only at research productivity. If someone deserves tenure as an outstanding scholar, but is a mediocre teacher, then the pedagogic weakness in such a case requires as much explanation and justification as do scholarly limitations when a superb teacher with little research is recommended for tenure.

Evidence of excellence is essential for favorable action on tenure, but it is not sufficient. The second principle enunciated in the University's policy is that the needs of the institution must be considered in each tenure decision. These needs relate primarily to the particular fields of specialization which are required by the department, the school or college, the campus, and the University as a whole so as to maintain a balanced program of teaching, research, and public service, viewed in the context of the present distribution of the faculty and the long range academic plans of the department, the school or college, the campus, and the University.

Careful long range planning as well as ongoing program review, assessment of needs, and the judicious use of vacancies and temporary appointments will go far toward maintaining the necessary flexibility and adaptability of the University to evolving priorities and interests, and to the continuing need for affirmative action. Such an ongoing process of looking ahead, of projecting, at each level, the staff requirements for a future period in relation to the present composition of the faculty and the plans of the unit, is essential to the effective operation of a tenure system, and much better than any kind of rigid tenure quota.

The projection of staff needs must be based in part on the careful and recurrent review of existing programs. The University is not and cannot be static. It is a living and dynamic collectivity of people, of ideas, and of intellectual and educational activities. Its strengths lie in the extent to which it combines a focus on lasting values and long range concerns with an adaptability to developing ideas and changing needs. This means that over time certain programs, certain activities, certain priorities wax and again wane in importance, pertinence or quality.

During the past decade of rapid growth there was little emphasis on the cycle. Any new needs could always be met by adding on, and there was no pressing need to reexamine critically what already existed. But during the years of consolidation ahead it will be only through critical reevaluation and reexamination of size, quality and viability of all our educational activities that we can rationally reallocate so as to undertake desirable developments.

The application of the University's tenure policy will be guided by the further conviction that the vigor and health of the University is best ensured if the responsibility for the necessary ongoing reexamination and reevaluation is shared by faculties and administration, rather than being left solely in administrative hands.

For the faculty to share in such a task is obviously difficult, for it imposes on them the painful necessity of viewing institutional needs ahead of individual and disciplinary interests. But in a growing number of major institutions in which this has been accomplished, the increase in the faculty's exercise of responsibility has made possible, in direct proportion, a corresponding and highly welcome increase in administrative restraint.

In spite of the considerable strains placed upon the University by periods of budgetary restraint, every attempt must be made to maintain its basically collegial nature. The fundamental principle of peer review is as central to the evaluation of academic programs as it is to the development of personnel recommendations.

In conclusion I want to state my own personal belief in tenure. The academic profession differs from all others in having the inescapable obligation to question, to probe and to criticize. One might say that streaking is nothing new on campus: Since the time of Socrates it has been the responsibility of the scholar to expose the nakedness of human or of ideological emperors. In the past, the hemlock cup and the stake have often tried to curb this kind of criticism. The principle of academic freedom, of "Lehrfreiheit," exists to make possible this fundamental obligation of the individual academic and of the University collectively, and tenure, in turn, is its beer safeguard. That is why I am committed to the collective task of maintaining the conditions essential to an effective tenure system.

MDC newsman digs those California rays

Not two blocks from the State Capitol, one finds a number of sex shops, which not as plush as those in Scandinavia, still offer the same wide range of "educational materials." And if you're into the cinematic area, you can deposit a quarter in a machine and watch "brown wrapper productions" fit for the most discriminating voyeur.

To top it off, a short distance from the Capitol, a top-notch double-feature was playing; "Deep Throat" and "The Devil in Miss Jones."

Whether it comes from a permissive attitude about pornography and sex or an attitude of who cares, Californiana if they're so inclines can indulge themselves freely in just about any activity. They are very enlightened or simply feel that if someone feels like doing something, it is fine as long as it doesn't interfere with their own lives.

The next time you plan to fly to Stockholm, change your flight. There's a little bit of Scandinavia right in the good old U.S.A.

But the state of California, is not all innocent fun and games. While people live in a free, happy-go-lucky attitude, there's a darker side to life out here, but it's a side that is shared all over the country.

In San Francisco, a mysterious band of murderers known as the "zebra" killers shot and killed their fifteenth victim since November; a nineteen-year-old Salvation Army Cadet. They Symbionese Liberation Army has promised to shoot on sight the "corporate enemies of the people." Will new-SLA member Patty Hearst be at the trigger? People are still jumping off the Golden Gate Bridge in the suicide Sweepstakes.

In short, California is no different than anywhere else in this country. The line between fun and tragedy is a thin one; it's like crossing a street. One side is the side we all see and know, the opposite side, the one we don't want to know, and refuse to believe that it exists.

In this paradise called California, it's hard to think of that other side.

Celebrating a people's deliverance

Franz Rosenweig (1886-1929), a native of Germany, was an accomplished historian and political philosopher before he turned to serious consideration of religion.

Rosenzweig spent his remaining years working on a translation and commentary of poems by Judah ha-Levi, a translation (with Martin Buber) of the Bible, and in writing essays on religious philosophy, education, Biblical and historical problems. The essay below is taken from Rosenzweig's The Star of Redemption.)

By FRANZ ROSENZWEIG

The welding of people into a people takes place in its deliverance. And so the feast that comes at the beginning of its national history is a feast of deliverance. Because of this, the Sabbath can legitimately be interpreted as a reminder of the exodus from Egypt. The freedom of the man-servant and the maid-servant which it proclaims is conditioned by the deliverance of the people from the servitude of Egypt. In every command to respect the freedom of even the man-servant, of even the alien among the people, the law of God renews the awareness of the connection holding between the freedom within the people, a freedom decreed by God, and the freeing of the people from Egyptian servitude, a liberation enacted by God. Like the creation of the world, the creation of the people contains the final goal, the final purpose for which it was effected. So it is that the people have come to feel this feast as the most vivid of the three, including the meaning of the two others.

Among the many meals of the liturgical year, the evening meal of the Passover at which the father of the household gathers together all his family is the meal of meals. It is the only one that from first to last has the character of worship; hence the Seder ("Order") is, from first to last, liturgically regulated. From the very start the word "freedom" sheds its light upon it. The freedom of this meal at which all are equally free is expressed in a number of rites which "distinguish this night from all nights", among them the reclining of the participants on cushions. Even more vividly than in this reminiscence of the reclining of the guests in the symposia of antiquity, this particular freedom expresses itself in the fact that the youngest child is the one to speak, and that what the father says at that table is adapted to this child's personality and his degree of maturity. In contrast to all instruction, which is necessarily autocratic and never on a basis of equality, the sign of a true and free social intercourse is this, that the one who stands — relatively speaking — nearest the periphery of the circle, gives the cue for the level on which the conversation is to be conducted. For this conversation must include him. No one who is there in the flesh shall be excluded in the spirit. The freedom of a society is always the freedom of everyone who belongs to it. Thus this meal is a symbol of the people's vocation for freedom. That this vocation is only a beginning, only the initial creation of the people, is shown in another aspect of this prominence of the youngest child. Since this youngest was permitted to speak for himself, the entire ceremony has, after all, to assume the form of instruction. The father of the family speaks, the household listens, and only in the further course of the evening is there more and more common independence until, in the songs of praise and the table songs of the second part of the meal, songs which float between divine mystery and the jesting mood begot by wine, the last shred of autocracy in the order of the meal dissolves into community.

The texts read from the Scriptures on the last days of the feast give a survey from the origin on to what is latent in this origin, in this creation of the people: on to revelation and ultimate redemption. The reading of the Song of Songs (customarily done after the conclusion of the Passover Seder) points to revelation. A distant view of redemption is afforded by Isaiah's prophecy of the shoot that shall come forth out of the stock of Jesse and smite the land with the rod of his mouth, of the day when the wolf shall dwell with the lamb and the world shall be as full of the knowledge of the Lord as the sea is of water. But the stock shall stand, an ensign for the peoples, and the heathen shall seek it. This is the deepest meaning of the farewell which those who participate in the evening meal bid one another: Next year in Jerusalem! In every house where the meal is celebrated a cup filled with wine stands ready for the prophet Elijah, the precursor of the shoot from the stock of Jesse, who is forever "turning the hearts of the fathers to their children and the hearts of the children to their fathers" (a part of the portion of the Prophets read on the eighth day of Passover), so that the flow of blood may not cease during the long night of time, and stream on toward a morning to come.

Chancellors back Wood on budget cutback

WORCESTER (AP) — Chancellors of the University of Massachusetts campuses in Worcester and Amherst have joined UMass President Robert C. Wood in condemning the proposed 6.5 per cent cutback in the University budget.

UMass-Amherst Chancellor Randolph W. Bromery said Gov. Francis W. Sargent's suggested $4.3 million deletion would have a "devastating impact" on his campus, causing "irreparable damage."

Speaking to UMass trustees who met at the Worcester Medical School Wednesday, Bromery said "The result would be a deterioration of educational programs, curtailed service to students in counseling and support areas, and reductions in maintenance, renovations, and supplies."

"No matter how we slice it, the students would pay the price," Bromery added.

Chancellor Lamar L. Soutter of the UMass Medical School added his voice to the call to exempt the UMass budget from the governor's budget cutbacks.

Soutter pointed to a projected freshman class enrollment of 64 next September, which, he said will not be realized unless funds budgeted to hire new teachers are voted.

The $7.9 million medical school budget will be reduced to $5.8 million under Sargent's cuts - a cut which would barely allow the medical school to keep its entering class at 40, the same as last September.

"It seems a cruel absurdity," said trustee Frederick S. Troy, "when you consider how long we've waited to get the medical school to the point where it can physically handle more students."

Bromery also cited a severe curtailment in student financial aid "which may exclude many students from low and middle income families from college."

Trustees also voted to delay consideration of a site for a veterinary school, pending "necessary commitment of resources by other states in the region."

Cutback disadvantages noted

"The Governor's proposed budget cut of 6.5 per cent would have a devastating impact on the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. Such an action would mean loss of $4.3 million, bringing our 1975 budget below the level of the State appropriation for the current fiscal year. Added to rapidly increasing inflationary costs, such a move would cause irreparable damage to our educational programs. Attempting to solve the State's financial problems by withdrawing support of the students in institutions of public higher education is short-sighted planning and forces educational administrators into poor management and unsound budgeting practices.

"The 6.5 per cent cut if enacted would force us to adopt inefficient "stop-gap" budgeting and management plans. No matter how we slice it, the students would pay the price. Personnel costs account for the largest portion of our budget. To compensate for an across-the-board cut, we would have to freeze vacant positions, forcing an ultimate reduction in force. If these actions proved insufficient, we would have to cut other non-personnel accounts to prevent further reductions. The result would be a deterioration of educational programs, curtailed service to the students in counseling and other support areas, and reductions in maintenance, renovations, supplies, and other academic support services. No matter where we make the cuts, the quality of the academic program is going to suffer. In addition to everything else, the cut would intensify our worsening unemployment situation in Western Massachusetts.

"Such a budget cut could substantially reduce the amount of financial aid for students, excluding many students from low and middle income families from college. If these people are never able to obtain higher education, the loss of their potential productivity to the Commonwealth would be irretrievable.

HOW DO YOU THINK MOST PEOPLE YOUR AGE DIE?
It's not drugs.
It's not suicide.
And it's not cancer.
It's automobile crashes.
More American people between the ages of 15 and 25 die in automobile crashes than in any other way.
At least half of those deaths are alcohol related. And the drunk drivers who cause most of them are under 25. Sometimes, many times, they kill themselves.
One of the most dangerous things you can do is get drunk and drive home.
You can change it. You have to.
You march against the war. You fight for clean air and clean water. You eat natural foods. You practice yoga. You are so much for life. And you are so much against killing.
It would be unthinkable for you to wittingly kill another human being.

The famous Boyer Brothers-James and Horace began their concert careers at the ago of 12. Concert and recording artists their music is a vibrant music which is both sociological and poetic in content. It has been included in major American Music Festivals and its use as a part of Black Protestant church worship is widespread. The Boyer Brothers founded the Festival of Black Church Music which is held each year and involves choirs, soloists, duets, trios, and quartettes as well as musicians. Horace plays organ and James plays piano. The brothers accompany themselves on recordings and in person. They feel that gospel music is a music of hope and inspiration. It expresses a faith by which both brothers live and it is shared with those who share that belief. Dorothy Love Coates is a singer, songwriter and composer of Gospel music. Ms. Love Coates is internationally known as won numerous awards and honors in the field. She has written 309 songs for gospel and won the respect of all her contemporaries. Dorothy Love Coates Original Compositions has been re-recorded by such great artists as Mahalia Jackson, The Staple Singer, Bessie Griffin, Johnny Cash and Buddy Rich just to name a few and hundreds of groups and choirs across the country. The life and musical work of Ms. Love Coates has been committed to history and she has proved herself a source of inspiration to both the young and the old.

Mr. Lerone Bennett, Jr. will present a lecture on The Meaning of Martin Luther King for The Black Community in the 70's.

Felony conviction hinders employment, reputation

Not all those convicted of larceny go to jail. Hampshire District Court Judge Luke F. Ryan assigned one young offender the task of writing an essay during a probationary period after conviction of larceny. The paper the probationer wrote, titled "The Effects of a Conviction of a Felony" is based on factual research in the UMass library and other. It tells a chilling tale of what employers think of the ex-convict. Judge Ryan asked that an edited version of the nine page paper submitted to him be reprinted in The Collegian. Here it is, in edited form.

More than fifty million people in the United States have some form of criminal record. For those with a serious record, especially those who have served prison sentences, prejudice and legal barriers regularly deny employment opportunities. Economic need then combines with discrimination to become the chief causative factor sending one in three of this group back to crime. A criminal released from prison on the average has about fifty-five dollars and a two-change wardrobe and therefore needs a job quickly. There can be prejudices even though he has never offended since the crime. Later in life it can always return. Estimates of recidivism vary from one-third to two-thirds of all former offenders.

Of four hundred and seventy-five potential employers interviewed in New York City three hundred and twelve stated unequivocally that they would never hire a release offender; three-hundred and eleven of the three-hundred and twelve said that they would fire such a man if they inadvertently hired him and later learned of his past. Of the remaining, sixty-two said that they were uncertain what they would do if confronted with this employment decision. The remaining one-hundred said they would hire a former criminal if he was qualified, but only forty-six had every knowingly done so. In a recent study of employment agencies, seventy-five percent of those sampled said that they would refuse to refer any applicant with an arrest record, whether or not followed by a conviction. Only now are they modifying this to read arrests followed by a conviction. Despite prison training programs, former offenders may be forced to accept employment at skill levels lower than they had before entering prison, and there is a considerable amount of evidence showing that they are underpaid.

A 1968 survey showed that seventy-two percent of the public are uneasy about working alongside ex-offenders. Plainly in the eyes of a majority of citizens and employers, the former offender, especially one who has served time in prison, is an ex-convict rather than an ex-criminal.

Where private prejudice does not make the offender unemployable, the state may. Approximately sixty occupations in California require state licenses. Thirty-nine of the licenses laws permit denial, revocation, or suspension for conviction of an offense involving moral turpitude. All states and a number of municipalities have similar laws. Licensed activity necessary to employment, such as driving is frequently forbidden after conviction.

The scope of some licensing laws can hardly be over-estimated, New York's Alcoholic Beverage Control Law, for example not only denies a license to a former offender, but also forbids a license to knowingly employ "in any capacity whatsoever" anyone who has been convicted of a felony or any other enumerated misdemeanors, including possession of burglar tools, receiving stolen goods, unlawful entry, prostitution, or vagrancy. The only exceptions are offenders approved in writing by the State Liquor Authority or having executive pardons.

Public employment is even more strictly regulated than licensed occupations. In over half the states public employment is closed to a person with a record of criminal conviction. The United States military services generally refuse or strictly condition the enlistment of persons with criminal records. Certain labor union activities by ex-criminals is prohibited by the Labor Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959, and private employers working on Defense Department contracts are sometimes required as a security precaution, not to hire former offenders. Where the statutes do not prevent public employment entirely the decision on hiring is regularly left to an administrative agency. Here, practical politics dictates that few ex-criminals are actually employed. In Commonwealth vs. Rudman, a Pennsylvania court defined the term "infamous crime," used in the employment disqualification section of the state constitution, to include all felonies. "Infamous crimes" was defined as one that renders a person "incompetent to be a witness thereafter" or "disables a man to be a witness or juror." Persons who have been convicted of felonies are ineligible for jury service. Similarly in Thomas vs. Evangeline Parish School Board, a Louisiana court found that a twenty-five year conviction required a school bus driver to fired from his job of ten years because the state constitution forbids public employment of convicted offenders.

A policeman discharged upon conviction is not reinstated by a pardon, an attorney is not automatically readmitted to the bar. A pardon does not even prevent subsequent license denial or revocation because of the conviction. In Baldi vs. Gilchrist, a taxi driver was denied a license renewal in 1922 because of a 1914 felony conviction, even though he had been pardoned in 1920.

Eighty-two percent of the persons charged with major felonies were prosecuted; seventy-three percent of those prosecuted were convicted of some crime on some charge. Thus, approximately sixty percent of the persons arrested for such felonies were convicted, and some forty percent were either acquitted or discharged in some other manner. Many, if not most, employers and employment agencies inquire whether an applicant was arrested regardless of whether a conviction resulted. An affirmative answer to the question is often sufficient to deny the applicant further consideration. Where there are two or more applicants for the same job, those with previous arrest records certainly stand in less favorable positions vis-a-verse the other applicants. a recent survey of employment agencies in the New York City area indicated that approximately seventy-five percent of the sampled agencies do not refer any applicants with a record of arrest, whether or not followed by discharge, acquittal, or a conviction.

Without justifying the discrimination, the rationale behind employers hiring practicers is perhaps understandable. Much of the discrimination against persons with arrest records is probably subliminal; between the applications of two men otherwise equal, the man without an arrest record might appear better suited for the job. Based on the belief that an arrest record might signal potential trouble in the future. Equally important, it is less expensive and certainly less troublesome to hire a man without a record than to investigate the details of the past arrest, which many employers want to do before hiring someone who had been arrested.

A Two Point Program To Stop Pollution.

The Litter Point. Someone just tossed a can on the ground. Use this point to point it out. Maybe next time he'll toss it in a litter basket.

The Air Pollution Point. Don't close your eyes to that smoking smokestack. Point it out to someone who can do something about it.

People start pollution. People can stop it.

Art exhibition

An exhibition of watercolors and wood collages by Dwight Little will open at Leverett Craftsmen and Artists on Sunday, April 7. The show will continue through Sunday, April 28, every afternoon from 1-5 at LCA in Leverett Center.

Dwight Little says of his work: "The wood collages suggest themes inherent in all grains of the natural wood, which lends itself to a variety of treatment. If may be as smooth as silk, rough as rock, or aged as granite. It is this last quality of age which has for me its greatest appeal.

"Wood may suggest the primeval or the primitive as much as stone. So it often happens that the subjects of these collages concern the primitive and the old. They may also suggest stone creations of runes, steles, or mosaics.

"Just as wood may represent permanence, so watercolor as a medium uniquely presents the ephemeral and the immediate."

Born in Brooklyn, New York, Dwight Little has lived in the Berkshire, Franklin and Hampshire County areas much of his life. At present he teaches at the UMass School of Business Administration. His is also co-director with Mrs. Little of Greenwood, a summer music school in Cummington, Mass., founded in 1933.

Mr. Little has exhibited at the Pittsfield Museum, the Cambridge Art Association, Phillips Exeter, Deerfield Academy, Williams College, and recently at the Loeb Theatre Gallery in Cambridge.

CCEBS meeting

There will be a mandatory meeting Sunday, at 6:00 p.m. in the New Africa House, Lumumba Hut, for all CCEBS seniors.

Information concerning future job trends, job alternatives, interviewing techniques, graduate school information, and resume writing will be discussed. There will also be several guest speakers who will hold seminar work shops for special interest groups.

Road closing

Clark Hill Rd., a main access road to the University of Massachusetts campus from the east, will be closed to vehicle traffic for two weeks beginning April 8, according to the Physical Plant Department.

The closing is required for the contractor to make final connections in the steam line being installed parallel to Clark Hill Rd., according to Physical Plant project director Red Langill. It will be effective at 8 a.m. Monday, April 8, and run to 4:30 p.m., Friday, April 19. During that period, only Pedestrian traffic may use the road.

Clark Hill Rd. begins near the north end of Hills House in the Central Residence Area and runs east and uphill to East Pleasant St., intersecting the latter near Butterfield House. The steam pipe work is part of a campus-wide steam line replacement project.

OH reading

Wholesale prices jump in March

WASHINGTON (AP) — Wholesale prices advanced sharply in March as increases for industrial goods outweighed declines in farm and food prices, the government reported yesterday.

The Labor Department said its over-all wholesale price index rose a seasonally adjusted 1.3 per cent last month following a jump of 1.2 per cent.

Though substantial the increases of the past two months were more moderate than in the November-January period.

With metals and fuel leading the way, industrial commodities jumped 2.9 per cent both adjusted and unadjusted, in March, the second biggest monthly increase since 1946. The rise was exceeded only by last November's 3.2 per cent increase.

Industrial prices are regarded as one of the most sensitive gauges of inflation in the economy, as opposed to food prices which move erratically from month to month.

Farm products, processed foods and feeds dropped in price for the first time in four months, by a seasonally adjusted 2.1 per cent. This was caused mainly by decreases for livestock, grains, raw cotton, eggs, poultry and fresh fruits and vegetables.

Since wholesale prices are usually reflected later at the retail level, higher prices for manufactured goods are likely in the coming months. However, there is no guarantee the decline in food prices will be passed along to consumers as supermarkets try to recoup profits squeezed in earlier months.

Chairman Herbert Stein of the President's Council of Economic Advisers called the March price report "markedly different" than in previous months, with farm prices declining and industrial commodities rising much faster.

The sharp increase in industrial prices was partly caused by the lifting of price controls and less heavily influenced by rising fuel prices as in the previous four months, he said.

Although Stein avoided any new predictions on inflation, the administration has said it expects the price explosion to ease during the later half of 1974.

Food service board keeps the meat cheap

By MARK KELLEHER
MDC Staff

Trying to hold down board increases, offer meal ticket alternatives, and participating in the selection of the new Food Service director are just some of the things the Food Service Governance Board is working on now.

Speaking on Wednesday Ass't. Chancellor Gage said that he was "pleased with the working relationship between Food Services and the Food Service Governance Board." He said he expected concrete recommendations and much progress to be made in the future as a result of this working relationship.

The Food Service Governance Board was established at the end of last year by the Student Senate to give students a viable input in policy-making decisions of Food Services. The board is composed of appointed representatives from all five residential areas as well as three representatives from the Student Senate and a representative from dining commons student employees.

Since its inception the Food Service Board has been plagued by a lack of student input. In view of the fact that most students, especially thooe living on campus, have an obvious and undeniable interest in the dining commons this is a strange phenomena. The feeling here is that over the years many students felt themselves powerless up against Food Services and the Administration. Daddy always knew best.

For the future the Food Service Governance Board plans are:

1. A revaluation of the present meal ticket plan. Many students are unhappy with the present plan and the Board has made inquiries to several universities to see how they run their meal plans.

2. The search committee for a permanent Food Service Director is being formed around May 1. This committee will include students in a proportion undetermined as of yet.

3. Alternative uses of Hampden Dining Commons. A bar or club is being mentioned. Hampden is costing a lot of money as it lays there idle.

4. To remain viable in the remaining weeks of the semester so that next Fall a hoped for increase in student input will have a foundation to build upon. As chairman of the Food Service Board, Matt Byrne said: "To actively participate in the policy making process of Food Services in a responsible manner takes time and people, but is really a worthwhile goal as it is students who must eat in the Dining Commons."

Media conference Wednesday

Interaction between campus media and black, white and Puerto Rican-Americans, along with the problem of access to media coverage will be discussed next Wednesday at a meeting of several campus media.

Organized by representatives of the Daily Collegian Black Mass Communications, Black New Service, WMUA, Drum and Eco Latino, the meeting will be open to the entire campus community.

It will be at 2:30 p.m. in Campus Center room 903.

The agenda includes the organization of different media, attitudes and conceptions of staffs, dynamics of past black and white relations and what can be expected — or created — for the future.

A planned conference of black and white campus media, with black reporters and editors from national publications will also be discussed.

The conference would bring the journalists to confer with both black and white journalists about their roles in the media, according to the organizers of the event.

A specific agency for the conference is as yet undecided, according to organizers. Suggestions will be solicited Wednesday.

Reunion comunicaciones

La interrelacion de las comunicaciones masivas en el campus de las comunidades de negros, ispanos y Americanos — la falta de las mismas y los problema eneciultos en la creacion de canales de acceso que sean iguali tacos para todos los grupos encueltos — serain el tempa parauna reunion que miembros de las comunicaciones masavas in el campus, ilevaran acubo.

Organizado por preresenatantes del Mass Daily Collegian, Black Mass Communication, Black News Service, WMUA, Drum, y The Mass Eco Latino, la reunion se ilevara a cabo en el campus center salon 903 a las 2:30 p.m.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

If you want a "bad debt" collected, call in Taurus. These persons can combine charm and muscle. The Taurus native appreciates the meaning of money, its value and how it can best be used. Taurus is not easy to understand; the streak of determination often becomes plain obstinancy. But this person will stand by in time of crisis, will put shoulder to wheel until vehicle turns and situation has gone from worse to better to good. Taurus provides the saving grace, is the solid mark, the individual who goes forth and oollects what is needed.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Health, vitality, dealings with neighbors and relatives—these are featured. Strive for balance. Stick to principles but remember concessions can be constructive. Those around you are argumentative and you may have to insert element of humor.

TAUTUS (April 20-May 20): Restlessness, change, dealings with Gemini, Virgo persons are spotlighted. Emotions tend to dominate. Exercise greater degree of control—or be prepared to pay the price. Lovers' quarrel could be on agenda. Something constructive will result.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Stick to facts. Answer queries in calm manner. Many now seem afraid of you. There is job ahead, that of winning confidence. Some family members want to tell you something. But you apparently are in no mood to be told much of anything.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): See beyond the immediate. Surface appearances could be deceptive. Know it and dig deep for additional information. Pisces, Virgo individuals could figure prominently. Some persons, behind the scenes, are intent on making road a bit rougher for you.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 2): Those who advise you about money may themselves be in need of counsel. Stick to what you know—refuse to be tempted by get-rich-quick schemes. Some of your past desires are now outmoded—you know it and it would be wise to admit it.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): You find ways of reaching more persons more of the time. Involves distribution, advertising and publicity. Aries, Libra persons could figure prominently. One who pulls strings could be out of sorts. Know it and act in mature manner.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Bring forth creative resources. What seems to be a lost cause can be successfully recovered. Leo, Aquarius persons play significant roles. What occurs behind closed doors is more important than is apparent. Know it and act accordingly.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Ability to teach and learn is accented. Emphasis is on what others want to do for you—and what you can do for yourself. Money is involved but is only part of the picture. It is the security of being needed that actually is the main feature.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): You are able to explore various directions. You will have sense of greater freedom. Another Sagittarian and a Gemini could figure in key roles. Be versatile; display sense of humor. One in authority is having a difficult time in personal life. Know it and be considerate.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): If thorough, you resolve dilemma. What seems uncertainty and delay could actually be an opportunity for you to gain second wind. Know it and make the most your time. Avoid becoming involved in petty bickering.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): You are stimulated, flattered and given chance for meaningful activity. Member of opposite sex is likely to be involved. Don't play games with emotions. You could become inextricably involved. Be aware. You get nothing for nothing.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Questions arise concerning co-operative efforts, contracts, marriage. Defer to wishes of one close to you. Avoid trying to force your way. Diplomacy now is key to ultimate satisfaction. Taurus, Libra could be in picture.

Football's "spring season" kicks-off today

By JOAN PLANTE

For those of you who think that football is purely a fall activity, there's something going on at Alumni Stadium at 3:30 today. At that time approximately 125 candidates for the Minutemen Football Team, will meet as spring ball begins. You see, in order to play on September 14th at Villanova, players must begin preparing as early as February 4th.

Back then, the players began working out, with a schedule of weightlifting 3 times per week, with alternating days of handball or basketball and 15 minutes of running (2 miles) each day. This was done without supervision, due to the fact that the NCAA prohibits mandatory workouts. According to Head Coach Dick MacPherson the results have been very good, but could be better if the coaches were allowed to share the workout time with the players.

Each practice is run in this manner: First to the locker room for unit meetings with the player's respective coaches. Then onto the field at 4:15 for pre-practice, calisthenics, and spots. Spots are exercises at various stations, which include tackling, running the ropes, pushing sleds, chins and dips on the bars, and wave drills. Everyone does these and then break up into groups by position. Regular practice then fills out the rest of the afternoon until it ends at 6:30. It's no easy day for anyone, the work is hard and this is where a football player spends his afternoon. Pads are always worn and most of the hitting is done in the spring.

There are 3 intersquad scrimages, the first being on Thursday, April 11th, after which the players are evaluated by the coaching staff. Since only 75 are eventually invited back for the fall, many players are cut at this time. Saturday, April 20th, another scrimage is scheduled and finally the day of the Red-White Spring Game arrives on Saturday, April 27th to culminate Spring practice. Still, it is not the end, because on August 22nd, while other students are still summering, the players come back once more, for 14 days of concentrated fall camp.

Coach Dick MacPherson stated that the defense will be concentrating on the zone, while the offense will be perfecting an option series to help the quarterbacks complement the passing game.

Aaron sheds Ruth's ghost

By ED SHEARER
AP Sports Writer

CINCINNATI (AP) — "Tying the record is eat, but breaking it is another thing," Hank Aaron said Thursday after the icy-nerved 40-year-old slugger joined the immortal Babe Ruth as baseball's all-time home run king.

Aaron sent his 714th lifetime homer out of Riverfront Stadium on his first swing of the 1974 season, a three-run blast off Cincinnati right-hander Jack Billingham. It came on a 3-1 pitch and sailed out over the left-field fence at the 375-foot marker at 2:40 p.m. EDT.

The soft-spoken Mobile, Ala., native talked of the initial excitement, but said it was dulled considerably when the Reds staged a comeback for a 7-6 victory after trailing at one point 6-1.

"It's just another home run now," Aaron said. "If we had won, I'd probably be over there in our clubhouse drinking champagne."

He expressed one other disappointment over the day. Noting that it was the anniversary of the slaying of Dr. Martin Luther King, Aaron said he and other black players had requested a few moments of silence in Dr. King's honor before the game "but someone with the Reds refused. We were all very disappointed."

The game was halted for six minutes as Vice President Gerald R. Ford and baseball Commissioner Bowie Kuhn congratulated Aaron on the field to the cheers of the overflow crowd of 52,154.

Aaron wasted no time in disposing of the controversy over whether he should play in Cincinnati or wait until the Braves return home Monday to begin an 11-day home stand.

"Yes, I'm going to play Saturday," he said. "I don't know about Sunday. I've only been ordered to play two out of three games here." The Braves do not play Friday.

The aging superstar chuckled at his remark, stemming from Kuhn's "suggestion" to the Braves that they use Aaron in Cincinnati as they did last season, playing roughly two of every three games.

"And," he added, "I'm certainly going to play the game the way it is supposed to be played. If I get a pitch to hit, I'll try to dispose of it."

Hard-hitting Minutemen aim bats at untried Eagles

By MIKE BROPHY

Boston College comes to town Sunday afternoon to face the Minutemen in their home opener after a successful Southern trip that netted UMass a 5-3 record overall. The Eagles, on the other hand, have not yet played a ballgame as they have had their opener rained out on two separate occasions.

Last season Craig Allegrezza got the victory for the Minutemen over B.C. as they scored an 8-4 victory in Newton going away. For this, and other reasons as well, it is probable that Dick Bergquist will have the big right hander on the mound against the Eagle on Sunday. Still recovering from a sore arm sufferred last year, Allegrezza looked good on the Southern trips and should be ready to go full tilt very soon.

Last year, however, the Minutemen hit .301 as a team and at this early stage of the campaign the Minutemen have a .267 batting average as a team. Quite a difference.

BC coach Ed Pellagrini feels that he has a "respectable squad" coming into this season but wishes he had been able to get a few games under his belt before facing UMass. "They are always tough and we have to play them right off the bat without really every having been outside." He continued to elaborate on the fact that the Eagles face most of the stiffer New England college teams in the first few weeks of the season. "We have to face Harvard, Providence, Northeastern, B.U. and UMass before we even get a chance to get our feet on the ground. We just will have to take them as they come, I guess," he said.

One of the stronger points for the Minutemen coming into this contest will be the outstanding play of centerfielder Pete Backstrom who came North with a team leading .444 batting average and an outstanding series defensively. "Pete made some super plays for us in the field," said Bergquist of his play down South.

Mike Koperniak, 7 for 18, too, has proven that he can do the job at the plate as well as in the field as he is off to a fine start in replacing Ed McMahon.

The big bat, and probable clean-up hitter, will be supplied by first baseman and captain Ron Beaurivage. While only hitting .200 down South Beau hit the ball with good authority but just didn't have Lady Luck going his way.

John Healy hit a very respectable, .293 while on the road and promises to be a major factor in the quest for a New England berth in any post-season tournaments for the Minutemen.

BC will probably come with Kevin Gormeley on the mound. A moderately big right hander, Coach Pellagrini says he is a "good one" and should give UMass a good battle.

Russ Small

Play ball!

By RUSSELL SMALL

Well folks, the Red Sox open their 1974 season today against the Brewers so what better time to talk baseball. Gang, if you liked my UConn over St. John prediction you'll love what I have to say about baseball.

Starting with the home town boys, I feel that this will be the year that hasn't been since '67', only this time it's not an impossible dream. With pitchers like Tiant, Lee, Marichal, Wise, Cleveland et al, the hitting of Yaz, Rico and Fisk, the speed of Harper, Beniquez and Cooper and the defense of Guerrero Griffin and Miller, this is the year.

It won't be easy though, Baltimore with perhaps the best outfield in baseball with the 3 B's—Bumbry, Blair and Baylor along with young Rich Coggins, will be tough. The birds also boast perhaps the best DP combo in Belanger-Grich. But, Mr. 3rd base, Brooks Robinson is old and slow, Earl Williams might be the worst defensive catcher in the game, and after Jim Palmer the pitching is suspect. A couple of lefty's named McNally and Ceullar are through, the Baltimore hurling situation is definately hurting. This will keep them from the pennant.

After the Sox and Baltimore it's all academic, but I think George "the boomer" Scott and 20-game winner Jim Colborn will lead Milwaukee into third place. The Perry brothers will improve Cleveland and leave them in 4th. Behind Cleveland comes Detroit (better known as the motor city old age home) and finally New York. Any team that plays Horace Clarke at second base will never win.

In the west it'll be K.C. with Mayberry and local boy Fran Healy leading the dethroning of the controversial Oakland A's who will learn how much harm new manager Alvin Dark can do to a good team. The return of Dick Allen will help Chicago but they still need pitching. California is still a couple of years away and Minnesota and Texas are so far away they don't know how to get there.

In the National League East it's probably be anybody's ballgame as it was last year and I have a feeling the cinderella team in baseball will be the Expo's who'll take the division if they can get some pitching out of someone besides Steve Rogers. With pitching that would make the Expo's eyes water, the Mets won't quite make it this year, though they'll still play right around the .509 mark which they won it with last year. Bundled up in a group will be Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, and St. Louis, in that order with the Cubs not too far out in last.

In the west, last years almost winner, the young L.A. Dodgers should make it this year. Right on their tails, though, will be the Cincinnatti Reds who's pitching will hold them back. Preston Gomez will Houston into 3rd place with San Francisco rebuilt but still a year away. The best slugging team in baseball, the Atlanta Braves with Henry Aaron, Dave Johnson, Darrell Evans, Dusty Baker etc. still have no pitching or defense and will wind up in 5th followed by the Padres, who stink.

That's it folks, Play Ball!

Trackmen face stiff test after losing opener to BC

By SCOTT HAYES

After suffering an 81-73 loss in the opener against Boston College, the UMass Spring Track team will host Boston University and Northeastern in a tri-meet tomorrow. The 1:00 p.m. home opener will be a "homecoming" for the tracksters, many of whom have been away from the comforts of a home track advantage for nearly a year.

The team members, who have had past success in front of the home fans, are looking forward to performing before their friends and families.

Coach Ken O'Brien stated that there were a few surprises in the BC meet, but more importantly he was able to spot a good number of the squad's weaknesses.

Curt Stegerwald took first in the 440-yard intermediate hurdles by lowering his personal best to 51.4. For Stegerwald, it was an excellent time for the first meet and his fastest ever.

Overall, the sprinters looked good and had a healthy start on the season. Steve Mason, a freshman discus thrower, took third in the BC meet. Mason and Tom Lonergan, both new additions since the indoor season, are capable of throwing over 130 feet in the discus. As Coach O'Brien put it, "The potential is there." Lonergan competed in the shot put at BC and captured second.

The additional distance events and sprints of the spring season will aid the Minutemen. Two additional sprints that cover longer distances than the indoor season will help the UMass sprinting corps pick up a few extra points.

There will be a few switches for tomorrow's big meet. Chris Farmer and co-captain Jack Maloney will be competing in the mile, with Randy Thomas and Bill Gillin running the two. Paul Segersten and Tom Maguire will see plenty of action in the six-mile run. Segersten made his return to competition a successful one, winning the two-mile at BC in 9:25. It was Segersten's first race since the NCAA's during cross country season.

Devin Croft and Pete Byron will be running the half, and the rest of the lineup should be similar to that used in the BC meet.

Northeastern is going to be a tough team to beat, and the Huskies will be aided by some of the added events of spring track. Strong discus and javelin throwers should make the Huskies a better team than they were while winning the New Englands during the indoor season.

BU has a good number of sprinters, but only a few top competitors in the hurdles and distance running events. BU also lacks outstanding jumpers and weightmen.

With a good turnout — both weather-wise and crowd-wise — the Minutemen could capture their first victory of the spring season.

In American League West

Outlook bright for A's under Dark

(Editor's Note: This is part three of a four part series in which Collegian Columnist Bob Estelle examines the major league baseball teams.)

By BOB ESTELLE

The World Champion Oakland A's should have no trouble repeating in the American League's Western Division this season. The reason is that no other club is strong enough to challenge them. The White Sox are still building a pitching staff, Kansas City isn't ready yet and the other three teams have too many weaknesses. The following summaries should explain why.

A HEALTHY DICK ALLEN is essential to the success of the White Sox.

OAKLAND A'S (1ST)

Three twenty game winners adorn the world champs. Vida Blue, Catfish Hunter and Ken Holtzman lead a staff backed up by John Odom, Darold Knowles and Rollie Fingers. Ray Fosse is the catcher, Gene Tenace will play first base, Dick Green still has hold of second base while all-stars Bert Campaneris and Sal Bando respectively are at shortstop and third base. Bill North, Joe Rudi, MVP Reggie Jackson, Angel Mangual and Jesus Alou will share the outfield. Deron Johnson is the A's designated hitter. New manager Alvin Dark should have little trouble winning his division.

CHICAGO WHITE SOX (2ND)

The hose was injured in 1973 and finished fifth but will come back to finish second this season. As previously mentioned, the only thing keeping them from challenging Oakland is a weak pitching staff. Beyond Wilbur Wood, Stan Bahnsen and Jim Kaat isn't much. Cy Acosta and Terry Forster are developing but can they produce this year? The White Sox will need more to beat the A's.

The rest of the team isn't bad, though. Ed Herrmann will catch. Dick Allen has first base, Jorge Orta plays second, shortstop belongs to Buck Dent while Bill Melton and Ron Santo, obtained from the Cubs, will battle it out for third base. Jerry Hairston, Pat Kelly, Ken Henderson and Carlos May will roam Comiskey Park's outfield. They will also be the team's designated hitters.

KANSAS CITY ROYALS (3RD)

The Kansas City Royals' main problems are a weak infield and outfield. While John Mayberry is an all-star, Cookie Rojas, Freddie Patek and Paul Schaal are average and Rojas is aging. Amos Otis is the only good outfielder. Hal McRae, Jim Wohlford and rookie Al Cowens will battle for the other positions. The catching is secure with Fran Healy. The pitching starts off with Paul Splittorff, KC's first 20 game winner. Marty Pattin, Steve Busby, Nelson Briles and reliever Lindy McDaniel.

MINNESOTA TWINS (4TH)

The Twins have Bert Blyleven, Eddie Bane, Dick Woodson and Bill Hands on their staff as starters but have virtually no bUllpen. Randy Hundley was acquired from the Cubs to bolster the catching. Harmon Killebrew and Joe Lis will share first base, Rod Carew is the league's best second baseman, Jerry Terrell will play short and Steve Braun will play third. Jim Holt, Bobby Darwin and Larry Hisle are the outfielders. Tony Oliva, one of the game's great hitters, is the designed hitter.

CALIFORNIA ANGELS (5TH)

The Angels have Nolan Ryan and Bill Singer but the pitching staff has little else. Rudy May, Skip Lockwood, and Dave Sells just aren't good enough. The catching is adequate with Ellie Rodriguez, imported from Milwaukee. Mike Epstein and Bob Oliver will share first base, Denny Doyle will play second, Rudy Meoli won the shortstop job last year and third base is open. Mickey Rivers, Ollie Brown and Richie Scheinblum will roam the outfield. Frank Robinson is the designated hitter

TEXAS RANGERS (6TH)

Billy Martin is the new Texas manager and he should keep things exciting there this summer, but not enough to lift the Rangers out of the cellar. But Ferguson Jenkins should have enough stuff left to keep the fans happy. Youngster David Clyde will help. After that, there's Jim Bibby. From there on, the pitching is flimsy. The catching job is open. Jim Spencer plays first, Dave Nelson is at second, Jim Fregosi and Toby Harrah play short and-or third.

Jeff Burroughs is a good outfielder, but he's the only one Texas has. Cesar Tovar and Tom Grieve are the other outfielders. Alex Johnson is the designated hitter.

(Monday: American League East.)

VIDA BLUE should pitch Oakland to their third straight Western division title.

"Old Man" Havlicek powered Celtics to fast-start win

BOSTON (AP) — When you are a professional basketball player and you start to get "old", things start getting tough.

John Havlicek of the Boston Celtics, who will be 34 Monday, is at that stage. All he was able to do Wednesday night was pump in 43 points as the Celtics beat the Buffalo Braves 120-107 to take a 2-1 lead in their best-of-seven National Basketball Association semi-final playoff series in the Eastern Conference.

Havlicek said he once discussed the matter growing old as an athlete with Bill Russell, former Celtic great and now coach of the Seattle Supersonics of the NBA.

"Russell told me that when you get to 33 or 34, things don't happen the way they used to," Havlicek said. "I guess he was right."

Regardless of how it happened, Havlicek made 18 of 30 attempts from the floor and was 7-7 from the foul line. He also hauled down 12 rebounds and had eight assists.

"It was my turn tonight, but it'll be someone else's next time," he said. "You never know what's going to happen. Next time they might not go in."

The Celtics fell behind early in the two previous playoff games, but managed to come away with a split, winning in Boston and losing in Buffalo.

"It was our idea to get off to as good a start as we could," Celtics coach Tom Heinsohn said. "We played the way we can play. If we run and work hard, we're the best."

Jack Ramsay, coach of the younger Braves team, saw things differently.

"We feel we're a better basketball team than they are," he said, "but if the game degenerates into a physical thing, it's a different story. This was physical mayhem."

Ramsey was upset by what he thought was a lack of called fouls.

"No calls is not the right way to control the game," he said.

Eddie Donovan, Buffalo general manager, also thought the game was too rough.

"Their out-of-bounds play under the basket is like the Green Bay Packers against the Chicago Bears' linemen," he said.

Boston roared off with a 39-point first quarter behind the shooting of Havlicek and center Dave Cowens. Havlicek got 26 of his points in the first half and Cowens, who finished with 23, got 17 before intermission.

The Braves cut the lead to 72-63 three minutes into the second half, but Boston put on another burst, outscoring Buffalo 13-4, and rolled to the victory.

Bob McAdoo of Buffalo finished with 38 points and Garfield Heard chipped in with 18. The two teams meet again Saturday afternoon in Buffalo.

Aaron ties Ruth's record

CINCINNATI (AP) — Hank Aaron, Atlanta's icy-nerved 40-year-old slugger, earned his niche among baseball's immortals today when he smashed the 714th home run of his illustrious career, tying the all-time record held by the legendary Babe Ruth.

The soft-spoken Atlanta star unloaded his historic blast in his first at-bat of the 1974 season — in the first inning against Cincinnati — to equal a mark once thought unreachable.

Aaron's blast off veteran right-hander Jack Bellingham cleared the left field fence about 380 feet from home plate.

A standing-room-only crowd estimated at 50,000 and including Vice President Gerald R. Ford and Baseball Commissioner Bowie Kuhn unleashed a long, noisy tribute to the aging super star, who made his mark on baseball with remarkable consistency in a career entering its 21st year.

Aaron's record-tying 714th home run was hit on 3-1 pitch with two men on base at 2:40 p.m., EDT, and failed to get into the left field bleachers, falling instead between the fence and the stadium wall. It was retrieved by a member of the Riverfront Stadium security force, brought back to the field and presented to Aaron by second base umpire John McSherry after Aaron returned to the dugout.

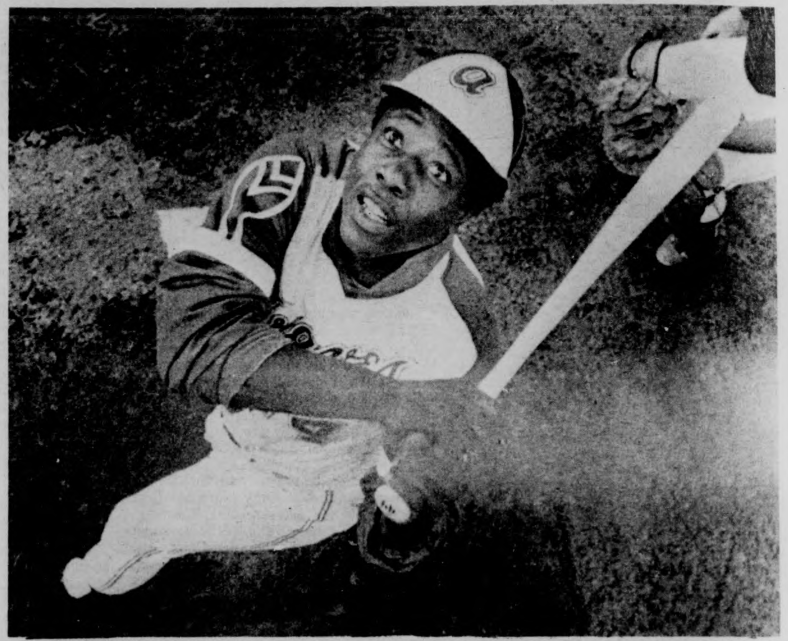
Ralph Garr had opened the game with a walk and Mike Lum followed with a single to left field. After Darrell Evans flied out, Aaron approached the plate to a loud ovation. He took two balls outside, then a called strike letter high and then another ball before lining the next pitch over the fence.

His Atlanta teammates poured out of the dugout to meet him at home plate and Aaron strolled to a box seat beside the Atlanta dugout and kissed his wife Billye.

Aaron then went into the dugout as the applause continued and came out again when McSherry carried the ball to him in a brown paper bag.

The game was interrupted for six minutes as the vice president and commissioner came onto the field to pay tribute to Aaron, along with Bill Bartholomay, board chairman of the Braves.

"Thank you very much," Aaron said from the field. "I'm just glad it's almost over with."



IT DIDN'T TAKE LONG for Hank Aaron to end the suspense that had been building since the end of last season as he lined his record-tying homer on his first at-bat of the year.

Can women strike gold in California ?

By CANDY GROSS

The 1974 AIAW National Gymnastics Championship will take place today and tomorrow at the University of California, Sacramento. It will be run much like the Eastern Championship held at UMass last month.

Qualifying for today's team and preliminary individual competition were eighteen colleges and numerous unattached gymnasts. The meet has been organized into six rounds with a maximum four teams per round and the individuals performing in the final round of the evening. Saturday's individual finals will consist of the top twelve women on each of Friday's events. Their two scores will be added to arrive at the winners. The All Around event is determined solely by Friday's meet.

The competition times were randomly drawn and placed UMass in the first rotation at 1:30 today. Competing with them will be Iowa State, California State U. at Long Beach and Seattle Pacific U. Although the Iowa men's team has been traditionally strong, the school is new to women's gymnastics and will be of unknown quality. Long Beach is expected to give the team some fair competition but Seattle Pacific has only one gymnast, Laurel Anderson, of any reputation.

Coach Virginia Evans, not completely happy about their first round position says, "one advantage is that we can get our competition over with and sit back and watch."

In this type of gymnastics meet a later rotation is usually preferred since the judging sometimes goes up as the judges get tired. "We're hoping the judging remains at the good caliber it's been and won't be a factor in the overall team and individual outcomes," says Ms. Evans.

Individual outcomes become a factor since all the elite unattached gymnasts compete as a group and in the last rotation. Scores may tend to be higher, out of perspective with the previous top individuals in the team competition, thus minimizing their performances.

In Nationals, a maximum of five gymnasts per event are allowed — four eligible to count for team total and one alternate. UMass' '74 National team consists of eight women competing as follows: Vaulting — Heidi Armstrong, Linda Nelligan, Jeannine Burger, Margie Combs, Anne Vexler (alt.); Balance beam — Jodi Hitt, Combs, Burger, Vexler, Armstrong (alt.); Floor exercise — Hitt, Combs, Vexler, Burger, Alicia Goode (alt.). The team will use the maximum five on vaulting only since Anne qualified in the Easterns for All Around.

Asked Monday night about their practice during spring break, Coach Evans stated that it went well "but it's hard to maintain a high peak over a vacation. The women have remained steady and confident with no careless mistakes in their routines. Actually, at this point they don't need the pressure of hard intense workouts and the trip itself should add the extra motivation to get them quietly ready."

Though competition is expected from four other schools in particular. First to spring to mind is naturally Springfield College, competing in the fourth round. They will strive to redeem themselves after their upset at Easterns by the UMass team. Last year at Nationals they took fourth place, slipping 3.45 points behind UMass. The third round matches two strong teams as Clarion State (5th in East) and Southern Illinois (2nd in Nationals) compete for top positions. Last year's third place team, Indiana State, was coached by Mr. Vannie Edwards. They will no longer present much threat as Coach Edwards has moved to Southwest Mississippi Junior College. Some of his top gymnasts have followed him there and rumor has it he has opened a gymnastics club as a feeder to the junior college. Therefore, it appears this new arrival to Nationals will provide quite a challenge for the other colleges.

This season ends with a new prediction — the UMass women's gymnastics team strikes gold in California! Watch for it in Monday's Collegian.

Nationals underpublicized

SACRAMENTO, Calif. - April 4 — There's a gymnastics meet out here Friday afternoon and Saturday night, but from its press coverage, you'd think it was a high school meet.

Neither of the two American press services are covering the meet. According to Ms. Kathy Shelley, the person responsible for press relations, the Associated Press and United Press International "are more content to take their information from local newspapers."

However, that doesn't emplain why the Sacramento Union had an AP dispatch on the National Men's Championships on one page of its April 3rd edition, and on the next page, an article on the Women's Championship.

According to Ms. Shelley, the publicity campaign which has been in progress for three weeks has been "very, very, good." If so, why did a Cal State coed go up to Anne Vexler yesterday in practice and ask Vex what she was doing out here? Shelley responded to my story by saying that "some people read and some don't."

Yet on our walk through the beautiful campus yesterday, we only saw two little posters advertising the meet.

Ms. Shelley said that the Cal State Gym, which holds 2,600, is almost sold out for the individual events on Saturday night. Asked how many people would attend such a meet in Los Angeles, Shelley hesitated and then replied upwards of eight or nine thousand people. But the meet is being held in a gym which holds only 2,600, in a state where women's gymnastics is much more popular than men's. To say it is strange would be an understatement.

In comparison with the way the Eastern Regionals were run, the Nationals have, so far, been a poor second. When UMass and Springfield came to the gym to practice at 1:30 yesterday, the equipment was not even properly set up.

The UMass team has been very surprised in general at the lack of publicity that the meet has been getting. The Springfield Union was the only one of several area papers to even have an article on the meet yesterday.

Perhaps the most organizers just couldn't care less about women's sports, but I don't think it's that at all. Women's gymnastics is beginning to become a very popular spectator sport and the only way it will continue to gain appeal is to have it held in large cities, or at least cities with a large base of popular support for the sport. Up until now, although that could suddenly change by meet time.

Perhaps the meet organizers still don't believe in the possibility that women's sports can make money. The Easterns at UMass marked the first time that that particular meet had made a profit. It can be done but people — not the gymnasts — must do the work if they want a successful meet.

The Nationals may be publicizing the meet but it's obviously not doing it often enough. It seems to me that the National Women's Gymnastics Championships deserve a better fate ... not to mention the gymnasts themselves.

MASSACHUSETTS DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS '74

3,300 Tired Liberals

by Reid Fishman

It was a big day for Framingham, and throughout the town there were colorful signs in restaurants and shops reading "Welcome Democratic Caucus". The streets of the town were lined with cars, and the atmosphere was pure politics. There were buttons, stickers and flyers of all sorts, and candidates and their workers could be seen scurrying about in continual efforts to gain support.

Inside the hall, amidst the clamor of registration and the confusion of proceeduralism, campaign managers were busily arranging their strategies. No one was sure of exactly what to expect, but everyone was prepared for a long day of speeches and ballots.

This was the day that liberals throughout Massachusetts had been waiting for. This was the day to which some candidates had pointed their entire efforts, and winning was nothing less than essential. This was the Mass. Caucus '74, and its purpose was to endorse Democratic candidates for the offices of Secretary of State and Attorney General within the state. It was open to any registered Democrat or Independent from Massachusetts, and the registration fee was one dollar in advance or two at the door.

The speeches began with various candidates getting up and trying to convince those who were undecided or pledged to candidates for the other contest to vote in their favor. The candidate for Attorney General with the greatest amount of support at the caucus was Attorney Edward F. Harrington, a younger man who had spent a great deal of time working in the Justice Department with Ramsey Clark, and had received an endorsement from him. Harrington is well known for his attacks on the Ku Klux Klan, Jimmy Hoffa, and the Syndicate, and his final words to the continually crowding audience were:

"In closing, I promise you, as I've been promising Democrats throughout the state, an administration of efficiency, of honesty, of decency, of fairness. I have the experience. I have the independence. I hope I have the courage to achieve this type of administration. In 1964, in the cruel society of Mississippi, I gazed upon the hillside and saw the fiery crosses. I did not flinch then. I will not flinch in carrying out the great responsibilities of this office in the public interest. I ask your support today. Thank you very much."

As the applause subsided, State Senator John Olver announced that there would be a brief recess for lunch. The candidates had thrown their pitches — all that was left was ballotting and lobbying, and more ballotting and lobbying.

Across the street, in a small store called the "Mary E. McElroy Corset Shop", Paul Guzzi stood with his workers, trying to estimate his support, and wondering as only a candidate can wonder. Unlike the race for Attorney General there was an incumbent, conservative Democrat to be beaten in the primary, and because of this, each of the candidates present at the caucus had agreed to abide by a caucus decision — to withdraw from the race for Secretary of State if the caucus presented an endorsement of sixty per cent to either of the other two candidates.

Amidst the jokes that are readily available at having a political headquarters in a corset shop, the Guzzi workers paced about, repeating strategies that had been reviewed countless times before. Going over the "game plan" one more time. It's hard to describe the tension that's forever present in a political headquarters on "that big day", but no matter how trite or unimportant that office might seem to outsiders, it's always a matter of life and death to those involved.

The Guzzi strategy was to obtain tallies of each ballot before the official tally was announced, in order to allow additional time for planning and implementing the strategy for the next ballot. Volunteers were to be stationed at the side of every delegation, where they would obtain the voting totals from that delegation. Those totals would be rushed across the street where they would be tabulated by Guzzi workers with small computers. It was a worthy system, but one capable of error if not implemented correctly.

As the now massive crowd of over 3,300 returned from lunch, John Olver stood up once again and announced the ballotting procedure, which was a complex system, using monitors, supposedly elected by each delegation.

Democratically endorsed for Attorney General — Edward Harrington. — Unflinching from the fiery crosses.

The amount of potential votes apportioned to each community was determined by the number of registered Democrats and Independents in that community. It was a system that favored the larger cities of Eastern Mass., as could be exemplified by the fact that Boston was apportioned 1,178 votes while a town like Williamstown was granted only 15. It seemed unlikely that the six people that drove four hours from Williamstown would have much influence over the masses that made the twenty minute cruise from Boston.

There were four candidates on the ballot for Secretary of State, although nobody seemed quite sure who William T. Kearney was. Aside from Guzzi, the candidates for this office were State Rep. John A. Bussinger and Boston City Councillor Larry S. DiCara, who seemed to have amassed tremendous support from within his home city.

In the race for Attorney General, there were eight candidates listed, but Harrington had a clear margin of support throughout the liberal chambers.

The voting was to take place in two auditoriums within the Town hall, and a third auditorium which was actually the cafeteria of a junior high school a few blocks down the street. It was in this cafeteria that they placed the less important delegations from small towns like Amherst, and others from across Western Mass.

As the first ballot was completed, the Guzzi machine went into operation, and a short time later, returned with the results that Paul Guzzi had carried the first ballot with 54 per cent, only six per cent short of the necessary figure. However, when John Olver finally got up to announce the official tally, the results were quite different. DiCara had carried the first ballot with 43.95 per cent, with Guzzi finishing second with 39.69 per cent and Bussinger third with 11.27 per cent. The Guzzi tally was immediately forsaken.

The tally for Attorney General was then announced, as Edward Harrington carried the field with 47 per cent; the next closest contender was S. Lester Ralph with 24 per cent. The caucus continued to a second ballot.

Back in the Guzzi camp, the strategy now was to get the 311 Bussinger votes to switch over to the side of Paul Guzzi, who has an extremely similar record to that of Mr. Bussinger in the state legislature. Anyone daring to exhibit a Bussinger button was repeatedly accosted by Guzzi volunteers in search of one more vote. It as expected that Bussinger would endorse Guzzi after the second ballot, but the Guzzi crew was trying to insure that endorsement before John Bussinger would have the chance to decide either way. When the second ballot was finished, the workers could only hope that their efforts had not been in vain.

It was a quarter past five by now, and it seemed that the fourth and final ballot would be ages away. Restless delegations began to leave, not even waiting around for the results of the second ballot. It was then that John Olver stood up again and pounded his two by four on the side of the podium and announced that the tally for the second ballot had been completed.

The plan had worked. Bussinger had lost 200 votes and almost all had gone over to Guzzi, who now boasted 47.9 per cent to 44.3 per cent for DiCara. The hall resounded as Olver announced that a third ballot was in order.

In the contest for the Attorney General endorsement, Harrington was now clearly in control with 57.1 per cent, only three per cent away from an endorsement.

The stage was now filled with the tumult of candidates and organizers trying to decide the best course of action. The contenders rushed over to talk with each other, and it was now obvious that something important was about to happen. John Bussinger vainly attempted to smile and joke as he walked up to the podium to withdraw. All ears were tuned to the speaker in hopes of hearing an endorsement, but there was none. Instead, Bussinger simply said, "I think the purposes of the caucus would be best served if it was a two candidate race on the final ballot, and therefore, I'd like to ask you to choose what you want to do but not to consider me."

The Guzzi supporters were disappointed as they prepared for a second ballot, but they now felt that the momentum was on their side, and that an endorsement might be reached by the fourth ballot, if they could keep their supporters from leaving.

Then came the shocker. In the face of changing momentum and tiring expectations, Larry DiCara quietly walked up to the podium and announced that he would withdraw from the race. A powerful blast of shouts and applause arose from the crowd, as a mixture of pleasurable success and the astonishing suddenness could be seen on the faces of all displaying the Guzzi medallion. DiCara continued, saying, "I am more interested in the success of a victorious candidacy in the fall of a reform-oriented candidate for Secretary of State than I am in my own candidacy."

Pols Throw Pitches — Olver Weilds

The hall resounded once again, as Paul Guzzi stood up to make his acceptance speech. With a bewildered but victorious smile on his face, Guzzi said, "I said earlier this morning that reclaiming the office of Secretary of State for the people of Massachusetts was the reason for our gathering here. And after the moves and speeches by both Larry and John, it's clear to me that we do share this commitment. It's clear to me that people were not only thinking of their self in a sense, but were trying to think of what the office of Secretary of State could mean for people. It's clear to me that John Davoren, here I come!"

And so the Mass. Caucus '74 came to a close, amidst the cheering and bellowing of thousands of happy and very tired liberals. Harrington received a token third ballot endorsement and it was time to go home, whether it be to Provincetown or Williamstown. But somewhere, beneath the blaring triumph, there was a permeating atmosphere of melancholy. Those whose candidates had faltered could only look back with dismay on the long tedious hours of seemingly worthless endeavor. Those that sensed victory now had to look ahead at a much harder battle to come. After all it was only a caucus, just like any other caucus, and they were only people, just like any other people.

Paul Guzzi, new Secretary of State?
Reclaiming the office for the people?

THE DRAKE — Strawberry Shortcake

by Wilma Brier

Many may be familiar with The Drake as a drinking establishment. They also offer a dinner and sandwich menu which we decided to investigate. In a casual, relaxed atmosphere (don't worry about a dress code) you can get anything from a quick snack to a light meal. It is basically short order cooking, and you pay when you're served. All food as well as take-out service is available from 11 a.m. to 1 a.m. The restaurant is self-service on weekdays until the waitresses come on duty at 6 p.m. On weekends, waitresses are on duty all day.

From the dinner menu we tried hot roast beef au jus on a roll ($2.15), fried chicken ($2.25), western supreme steak ($4.00), fried Ipswich clams ($2.25), and the St. Patrick's Day special corned beef and cabbage ($1.50). The roast beef au jus which was actually a hot roast beef sandwich came with a good salad and french fries. It was okay, although not outstanding. One of the best dinners, the crispy fried chicken, came with cole slaw, potato wedges, and a hot roll. The generous serving was well worth the price. The steak was not. We've had better and do not recommend it. The fried clams were good and not greasy. They came with french fries, salad, and a hot roll. The corned beef and cabbage was delicious and a bargain at $1.50. Although in the past just available on St. Patrick's Day, it may be offered on a more frequent basis as a result of its popularity. The only selection from the sandwich menu we tried was the cheeseburger ($.95) which was not good for the price. The soup du jour, vegetable beef, ($.35) was delicious and the side order of onion rings ($.65) was crispy, tasty, but perhaps overpriced.

There is a small selection of desserts, including apple pie with ice cream, peach or strawberry shortcake, spumoni ice cream, and danish pastry. All of the desserts are $.50. The spumoni and the shortcake were especially good and the apple pie not bad.

A definite plus to dining at The Drake is the wide selection of beer, wine, and liquor. You can sample bottled beer from 27 countries or try one of 7 kinds on draft. Several varieties of Paul Masson wine are offered from dinner wines to champagne. There is a wide selection of liquor including 40 different cocktails.
